$1.2b. U.S. aid package trapped in 'bureaucratic nightmare'

By WOLF BLITZER
Jerusalem Post Correspondent

WASHINGTON – The $1.2 billion in U.S. economic assistance provided to Israel in October has been frozen in a separate Israeli bank account because of recently-enacted U.S. restrictions on the money's use, U.S. and Israeli officials said yesterday.

Israeli Finance Ministry representatives, during extensive but unpublicized discussions with Reagan administration officials and Congressional leaders, have been trying to get Israel exempted from the restrictions, which were signed into law by President Reagan in late October 1986.

The restrictions affect all countries, not only Israel, receiving U.S. Economic Support Funds (ESF). The legislation, originally sponsored by members of the House and Senate appropriations committees, gives the U.S. greater control in making sure that those funds are used properly and legally. The money is supposed to be spent solely for imported U.S. commercial goods and services, not for military purposes.

Soviets study Israel's entry visa request

By MENACHEM SHALEV
Post Diplomatic Correspondent

The Soviet Foreign Ministry confirmed to The Jerusalem Post yesterday that an Israeli request for entry visas to Moscow for a "consular-technical group" was "under consideration."

The deputy head of the ministry's Information Section, Vadim Pavlovich Pensleyev, said in a phone interview with Moscow that the Israeli request under review was for the "specific task" of examining the Israeli interests section at the Dutch Embassy in Moscow and the building which used to house the Israeli Embassy there - on which "the lease is continuing."

Senior sources in Jerusalem said last night that the public acknowledgement of the fact that the Israeli request was being considered was a significant shift, since previously they had depicted the matter as "premature."

Pensleyev said that Moscow does not view the Israeli request as part of "reciprocity" for its mission here. The two issues are not "linked" nor are they "comparable," he said, since "we have no Israel property or citizens here."

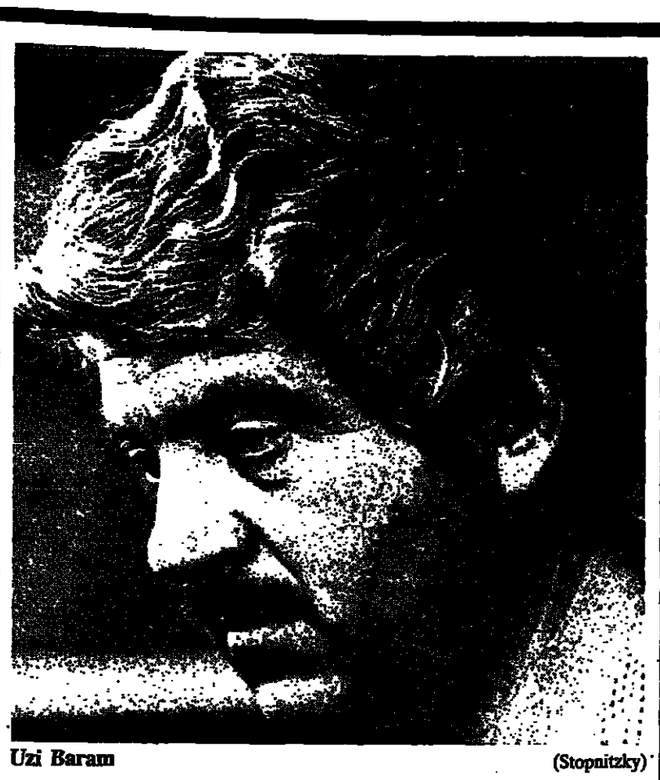

The Soviets understand that lack of progress on the Israeli request for reciprocity could create "difficult problems" for the expected Soviet request for an extension of visas for their mission here, officials in Jerusalem said. The visas for the mission currently expire on January 14.

"From the beginning," Pensleyev said, "the presence of our group was not conditional on reciprocity."

The newly-appointed head of the Soviet mission here, Georgi Martirosov, indicated to Foreign Ministry officials yesterday that he would soon submit an extension request, but the Soviets have yet to do so formally. It is understood that the timing of their submission might be linked to a possible Moscow decision on the Israeli request.

Although Pensleyev refused to confirm Moscow's intention to ask

Uzi Baram (Stopnitzky)

Labour in turmoil after Baram quits

By MENACHEM SHALEV and ASHER WALLFISH
Jerusalem Post Reporters

The shock resignation of Labour Party Secretary-General Uzi Baram, announced in Tel Aviv yesterday afternoon, threatens to plunge the party into organizational and ideological turmoil, party sources warned last night.

Labour Party leaders were pressing Baram last night to retract his resignation, which took them all – including party leader Shimon Peres – by complete surprise.

Baram's resignation follows continuing differences with party leaders –especially the Labour ministers who resent his "independence" – over matters relating to the "democratization" of party procedures for choosing its candidates for the Knesset. Baram, a dove, has also voiced sharp criticism in private of the party leadership's handling of the peace issue and the territories.

The most recent attack against Baram came at Wednesday night's meeting of Labour Party ministers in which Defence Minister Rabin and Economic Planning Minister Gad Ya'acobi accused Baram of "working behind their backs" by attempting to "pack" the list of candidates for the next Knesset with candidates of his choosing.

Baram was not invited to Wednesday's meeting. Normally, he is when party matters are on the agenda.

The ministers claimed that Baram had been "conspiring" with Labour Party branch heads to make a deal allowing them to choose the candidates of their choice for the Knesset. In exchange they would support "attractive" candidates to be chosen among the Knesset places earmarked for election by the Central Committee. They said that Baram's actions contradicted his claims of genuine "democratization" in the party.

Rabin also reportedly criticized Baram for the dovish tinge which he has infused in the party and the fact that Labour's campaign staff, which is supposed to be headed by Baram, is too dovish.

Baram said last night that he has not yet decided whether he would

Siniora launches campaign with boycott of cigarettes

By ELAINE RUTH FLETCHER
Jerusalem Post Reporter

A civil disobedience campaign calling initially for a boycott on Israeli-made cigarettes and soft drinks, was launched by Al Fajr editor Hanna Siniora yesterday. The move drew broad attention from Israeli media and politicians but a certain scepticism among leading Palestinians.

"Smoking anyway is bad for your health. It's probably good to call on people not to smoke," said Bir Zeit University professor Sari Nusseibeh. "But it has to be a grassroots movement. No matter how enlightened Hanna's suggestions may be, as long as it's not a grassroots demand, I don't see how he will be able to succeed.

"Having said that," Nusseibeh added. "I've found that people are not at all hostile about some kind of civil action of this kind. There is a nascent readiness to adopt measures like this... Once it has matured, and obtains grassroots support it probably will catch on."

Siniora's move, which included a threat of tax rebellion and strikes if arrests and expulsions in the territories continued, drew calls for his deportation from the right.

Gush Emunim leader Benny Katsover and MK Haim Druckman (National Religious Party) joined Tehiya MK Yuval Ne'eman's call for deportation of Seniora.

Since Siniora is a Jerusalem resident, rather than a West Bank resident, Israeli law forbidding deportations applies to him.

Police Minister Haim Bar-Lev said he was investigating if Siniora's civil disobedience call was illegal, warning that Siniora's ideas would "hurt the Palestinians themselves."

But Likud MK Ehud Olmert, an attorney, said he didn't see a legal problem in Siniora's call for a boycott of soft drinks or cigarettes.

"It's up to them," said Olmert. He described Siniora's initiative as a "public relations" exercise but added that it might represent something positive for Israelis — "the recognition that violence cannot achieve what they want and this is an at-

Bassiouny: relations could be broken

By ELAINE RUTH FLETCHER
Jerusalem Post Reporter

Egypt could consider breaking off relations with Israel, recalling its ambassador or reducing its embassy staff if the situation on the West Bank continues to deteriorate, Mohammed Bassiouny has told the Nazareth-based newspaper As-Sin-a'ara.

Bassiouny warned that the future development of ties between Israel and Egypt "depend on the development of the situation in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, negative or positive," in an interview published today with the independent Arabic newspaper.

"There exists the possibility of a break in relations, a recall of the ambassador or the reduction in the embassy staff," Bassiouny said. "However, this is not our objective. Our big objective is to find a just solution to the Palestinian problem. The (Israeli-Egyptian) peace agreement isn't a separate peace agreement but a first step towards the realization of a comprehensive goal."

Bassiouny later told The Jerusalem Post that "of course" measures like cutting ties or recalling the ambassador have been considered.

He stressed that "it's not our target to break off diplomatic ties... Our main target is to achieve a comprehensive peace. All options are possible but our strategy is the strategy of peace.

"What can I do if there is a negative development in the West Bank and Gaza, like deportation?" he asked. "Nobody can accept it in the world, including Egypt."

Bassiouny's remarks followed interviews with Egyptian President Hosni Mubárak in the Kuwaiti press earlier this week, in which Mubarak affirmed that Egypt had no plans to recall its ambassador in the wake of disturbances in the territories.

One said dead, 8 wounded in Gaza Strip

Troops clash with 1,000 Palestinians

By BRADLEY BURSTON, ANDY COURT, and ELAINE RUTH FLETCHER
Jerusalem Post Reporters

IDF troops clashed yesterday evening with over 1,000 demonstrators in the Nuseirat and Muazi refugee camps in the Gaza Strip. Palestinian sources said one person was shot dead and eight wounded, but the IDF denied anyone had been killed.

Foreign relief workers told Reuters that the man was killed at the Muazi camp. Unconfirmed reports from local residents say that a second man was shot dead at the nearby Nusseirat camp.

The IDF spokesman reported soldiers opened fire with .22 calibre weapons after they were attacked by a crowd of more than 1,000 rock-throwing Palestinians. The spokesman said the troops fired rubber bullets and used tear gas before shooting live ammunition.

The relative calm in Jerusalem during the past few days was shattered yesterday by a commercial strike, a demonstration by schoolgirls, and the stoning of an Egged bus on the Shuafat Road. One bus passenger was lightly injured, and 15 Palestinians – nine of them young women – were arrested.

On the West Bank, youths threw stones and bottles at U.S. Senator John Chafee forcing him to cut short a visit to the Kalandiya refugee camp.

The Jerusalem police will beef up its forces today and tomorrow to handle any new disturbances, according to spokesman Rafi Levy. A few hundred policemen and Border Policemen will be patrolling the city this weekend, including about 100 policemen who are not normally assigned to the city, he said.

City and police officials were not certain why the unrest escalated yesterday, but some attributed it to the influence of events in the territories.

"Jerusalem is not an isolated island," said city manager Aharon Sarig, the municipality's former adviser on Arab affairs. "Everywhere in the West Bank there are disturbances, and that influences the kids here. They see what is happening on television. They talk constantly with friends and relatives in the West Bank."

But Sarig said that the demonstrations in Jerusalem are still relatively minor "if you compare it to what is happening in the West Bank," or to the rioting in the city almost three weeks ago.

A group of pupils from East Jerusalem girls' schools demonstrated yesterday morning on Salah e-Din St., shouting anti-Israel slogans and raising a Palestinian flag. At about 10 a.m., the pupils blocked the road and threw stones, the police said.

Policemen armed with clubs and riot helmets broke up the demonstration. Nine young women and Elias Zananiri, the editor of the al-Awda newspaper's English edition, were arrested during the protest. All of them were later released on bail.

Shops in East Jerusalem were closed yesterday afternoon, and there were partial commercial strikes in Shuafat and Beit Hanina. Palestinians burned tyres at A-Tur

Shultz: Ties unshakeable

By WOLF BLITZER
Jerusalem Post Correspondent

WASHINGTON – Secretary of State George Shultz yesterday strongly restated what he called the "unshakeable" U.S. commitment to Israel despite this week's U.S. vote against Israel at the UN Security Council.

At a State Department news conference, Shultz acknowledged that the U.S. was upset about the latest round of violence on the West Bank and Gaza Strip. But he then added:

"I think it's important for everyone to understand that the U.S. regards its friendship and the strength of its relationship with Israel as a key and unshakeable relationship. No one should misinterpret a vote as meaning anything else. In fact, I suppose the ability to differ occasionally with a friend shows the depth of that friendship."

Shultz was referring to the U.S. vote Tuesday night in favour of a UN resolution urging Israel to refrain from deporting Palestinians from the West Bank and Gaza Strip. Since then, Israeli officials have expressed their disappointment with the U.S. stance.

Shultz told the news conference it was "important for everyone to recognize that it is the duty of Israel to maintain law and order" in the territories. "We believe that that duty can be well-performed without the use of lethal means," he continued. "We've said so.

"But more than that, the whole history of the Middle East shows that violence in the various forms when it's been used – terrorism, war – just hasn't worked. Those developments that have led to a more peaceful and more useful situation have come about through negotiations: sometimes large negotiations, sometimes more particular negotiations, but it's negotiations that work. And that's what we, of course, encourage."

Asked whether the U.S. might restrict its support for Israel because of the disturbances in the territories, Shultz replied categorically: "Israel is a democratic country seeking stability and peace and the ability to pursue its destiny. And we support that country. And we support those objectives. And we work closely with Israel. Problems come up from time to time. We resolve those problems. Occasionally, we disagree, but through all of that, this relationship, as I said, is unshakeable – that's what that means."

Shultz said he was looking forward to Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak's visit to Washington at the end of this month. "We'll be consulting with him closely about the peace process, as well as developments in Egypt and about the Gulf, which he has been visiting," the secretary said.

But in response to a question, he acknowledged that serious obstacles remained unresolved in achieving direct Arab-Israeli peace negotiations. He once again confirmed that the U.S., under certain conditions, would be prepared to support an international peace conference.

A new phase in an old war

ANALYSIS - Yehuda Litani

A few days after the violence erupted in the occupied territories, Chief of General Staff Dan Shomron attempted to calm the nation's jangled nerves by saying the riots would be over in a few days. His words were echoed by the prime minister, the deputy prime minister and this week, nearly a month later, the same soothing words came from Defence Minister Yithak Rabin.

But even as he spoke, the streets of the West Bank and Gaza were filled with clouds of tear gas and resounded to the crack of rubber bullets fired from automatic weapons.

It seems they have all got it wrong. Everyone, from the prime minister to the chief of general staff, has underestimated what is going on in the territories.

After the Yom Kippur War in 1973, we all claimed that we had been "the slaves of an incorrect conception." That conception maintained that the Arab states would not dare to attack a strong Israel and if they did, we would know about it a long time beforehand.

The common Israeli view, one that has been adopted by all Israeli governments since 1967, is that Palestinian resistance in the territories comes in shortlived waves and that Israel can control the territories as long as it wishes. This view holds that riots are a result of external incitement (by the PLO leadership)

Civil rights group to check situation in areas' prisons

By BERNARD JOSEPHS
Jerusalem Post Reporter

Israel's civil rights watchdog group is to visit prisons where more than 1,000 Palestinians are being held, following allegations that inmates are being physically abused and living in wretched conditions.

The Association of Civil Rights said last night that it is also concerned that military judges are "automatically" ordering suspected rioters to be held in custody pending trial.

Lawyers representing Palestinian detainees have charged that prisoners, some of them in their early teens, are kept in overcrowded conditions, are short of food, have no sanitary facilities and are beaten. They have also charged that two suspected rioters were tortured with electric shocks to force them to confess.

The IDF rejected the allegations of torture "outright" and said they were propaganda. As to prison conditions, the IDF spokesman said that prisoners had the same type of accommodation as those given to jailed soldiers.

Joshua Schoffman, legal director of the civil rights association, said his group had received permission from the Defence Ministry to visit the Ansar 2 prison camp in Gaza, Farah prison near Nablus and the Dahariya camp near Hebron.

He said: "In view of the unprecedented round-up of people, and the young age of many of those in detention, we want to check what is happening. The lawyers are claiming conditions are bad and the army says it is treating the prisoners humanely. We are going to see who is right."

Schoffman said that association observers had been attending the speedy justice trials at Ramallah and Hebron and, although the trials followed accepted procedures, there was cause for worry as so many people were being remanded in custody.

"It seems there is virtually automatic detention until trial regardless of the age, the personal circumstances and even the severity of the allegations against the suspects. The judges are only giving consideration to the prime facia evidence and not giving any weight to the circumstances of the individual," he said.

"There is an assumption that anyone arrested is dangerous and those few cases in which people have been released until their trial have all involved very young defendants."

Meanwhile, a delegation of Spanish attorneys, including members of parliament, said at a press conference that the trials in the military courts were worse than those held by the Franco regime. Striking Palestinian lawyers were "absolutely justified," said Brandes Molet, a left-wing MP who defended political prisoners during the Spanish dictator's reign.

In a related development, over 150 top academics from Jerusalem's Hebrew University and Tel Aviv University have formed an "inter-university group for ending the occupation."

Among the professors supporting the group are sociologist Shmuel Eisenstadt, economist Dan Patinkin, historians Shmuel Ettinger and Saul Freidlander, and philosopher Asher Kasher.

Tel Aviv trio in London hash-smuggling trial

By JONATHAN KARP
For The Jerusalem Post

TEL AVIV – Three Israelis, who grew up together in South Tel Aviv, are to go on trial today in London on charges of smuggling nearly two tons of hashish from Lebanon. The drug has an estimated street value of £5 million.

James Greenfield, a British citizen and alleged anarchist, is to join them in the Old Bailey as the fourth defendant. A fifth suspect, John Barker, has escaped from police custody.

The ties that bound Yitzhak "Tzahi" Ferman, 31, Moshe Strohweis, 33, and Asher Sivan, 30, were created in the vacant lots of the underprivileged neighbourhood of Kiryat Shalom and were strengthened over the years through various business deals. The three were well-known for their membership in a gang of motorcycle enthusiasts who also frequented bars and night spots around town.

Ever since he fled Israel in the fall of 1982, Ferman has been a fugitive from the military police, who had charged him with attempting to smuggle hash from Lebanon.

That episode allegedly occurred after the IDF entered the Beirut area just before Rosh Hashana in 1982. Ferman was on reserve duty as a photographer for Bamahane, the IDF magazine, and was accompanied by Amir Sheinkman, a reservist reporter for the magazine.

On the way back to Israel, the military police at Rosh Hanikra searched their car with trained dogs. When the search began, Ferman reportedly reached into his pocket and threw a small wad of paper toward the sea. But a dog retrieved it and the police reportedly found some hash inside. The police said they later found more hash in Ferman's kit bag in the car.

Ferman and Sheinkman were arrested. Sheinkman was released shortly afterwards, while Ferman was remanded for the maximum of 15 days.

Events took a strange turn at the end of that detention period. Ferman was released, but the army did not issue an order prohibiting him from leaving the country. He went to get travel clearance from his reserve unit, and the next day fled to England. The day Ferman left, Sheinkman was re-arrested and questioned for 11 days. Convinced that he was not involved, the army finally released him without an indictment.

Though barred from returning unpunished to Israel, Ferman reportedly showed up in Tel Aviv in the fall of 1985. Using a British identity and driving the latest model Porsche, he went so far as to flaunt his "success" – which he claimed was based on profits made in the furniture business – in the editorial offices of Bamahane, his last place of work in Israel.

It is believed that he also used the visit to let his close friends in on his various other sources of income.

About nine months later, after some intelligence work and patient tracking of a ship from Junieh, Lebanon and then a truck from the port of Felixstowe through Sheffield, Manchester and into London, British customs officials and police arrested Ferman, Strohweis, Sivan and the two Englishmen.

Bezek workers inspect a phone-connection box on Hahagana St. in Givatayim that was torched by vandals. Boxes in Herzliya and Rehovot were also torched in the second round this week of such incidents. Over 700 phone subscribers had their lines cut because of the vandalism. It will take Bezek several days to repair the damage and resume service. Police suspect that owners of "pirate" cable TV stations were behind the incidents. (Israel Sun)

Britain's shadow foreign secretary:

Deportation orders a gesture of 'petulance'

By JEFF BLACK
For The Jerusalem Post

GIVAT HAVIVA – Visiting British opposition foreign affairs spokesman Gerald Kaufman said yesterday that the planned deportation of nine Palestinians was "a gesture of petulance." He added: "I believe it is a violation of the Geneva Convention."

Kaufman, who arrived in Israel on Wednesday after talks in Amman, said the deportations "will place the Arab countries most amenable to negotiation with Israel – Jordan and Egypt– in unnecessary difficulty."

The Labour party shadow foreign secretary referred obliquely to the rumpus which surrounded this week's visit of Foreign Office Minister David Mellor and his own brief incident with Israeli security officials at the Balata refugee camp on Wednesday.

"Fortunately (the incident) was not a very heightened one and fortunately one which didn't become notorious." Kaufman stressed that Mellor was not a member of his party "and he must take responsibility for what he said and did... I don't come here as somebody who wishes to see the return of the British Mandate. I come here as a spokesman of the Labour party and as a very long-standing supporter of the state of Israel.

But Kaufman stressed: "I completely oppose what Israel has been doing (in the territories). One of the

Panic at Haifa fuel pumps

By YA'ACOV FRIEDLER

HAIFA – Panicky drivers yesterday rushed to petrol stations here, creating long lines of motorists scrambling for dwindling supplies.

The shortage followed a strike by workers at the three fuel companies which have their main depots here. The work stoppage was caused by employees' fears that the Energy Ministry's reform of the oil industry will cost some of them their jobs. Under the reform, oil refineries will be allowed to market one third of the fuel directly to big customers, bypassing the fuel companies.

As the stations filled with anxious drivers concerned by rumours of an impending shortage, the stations' fuel tanks emptied, and the fuel companies obtained injunctions from the district labour court ordering workers not to disrupt operations.

In addition, the Energy Ministry issued back-to-work orders to fuel company employees. It is hoped that supplies will return to normal today before the panic spreads beyond Haifa.

IDF denies it blockaded Shi'ite village in zone

By DAVID RUDGE
Jerusalem Post Reporter

ROSH HANIKRA – The IDF yesterday denied allegations that it has blockaded a Shi'ite village just north of the Security Zone in South Lebanon for the past six days.

Lebanon's ambassdor to the UN reportedly lodged an official protest on Wednesday with the secretary-general over the "siege" of Yohmore.

According to the Lebanese media, the blockade started on December 31, a day after IDF troops had tracked a wounded terrorist to the Shi'ite settlement. The gunman had been wounded the previous day in a clash with IDF troops.

The Lebanese papers reported that a roadblock was set up on the only road into the village after the residents there refused to hand over the injured gunman.

The barriers were removed on Wednesday, apparently to allow an international Red Cross food convoy into the village.

Israeli military sources said last night that neither the IDF nor the South Lebanese Army had imposed a curfew on the village.

Recommendations due next week on appeals against deportations

By JOSHUA BRILLIANT

TEL AVIV – The committees hearing appeals against nine deportation orders are expected to present their recommendations next week, military Judge Advocate General Tat-Aluf Amnon Strachnow said yesterday. Recommendations regarding West Bank residents will be presented to the OC Central Command and those regarding Gazans to the OC Southern Command.

The hearings are conducted in keeping with all relevant regulations, Strachnow told reporters. The defendants, their lawyers and International Red Cross representatives are present, but the deliberations are closed to the public.

The committee meeting in Gaza yesterday completed hearing the arguments against four deportations. The two committees meeting in Nablus postponed their deliberations to give attorneys time to study the cases, but Strachnow said they would probably reconvene on Monday or Tuesday.

Meanwhile, attorney Lea Tsemel has appealed to the High Court of Justice against a decision barring 11 attorneys from representing Jibril Rajub in Nablus. Some of them had appeared before the committee headed by Sgan-Aluf Mordechai Peled, who was hearing two appeals. When the hearing ended, the 11 filed into the room where Aluf-Mishne Dan Guetta was holding a hearing.

Guetta ordered everybody out, except those who in fact are presenting Rajub's case. Strachnow said that three or four attorneys would be a reasonable number.

Earlier yesterday, President Chaim Herzog rejected criticism of the speedy trials in the territories. Addressing military court judges and attorneys , Herzog said that during the half day he had spent with the military Judge Advocate General's unit, he had looked into "the entire process of maintaining the rule of law in the IDF.

"I can testify that everything is being done, under very difficult conditions, to maintain the rule of law. We may be proud of the IDF's legal system," he said.

Peres felt 'sorrow' while testifying at Vanunu trial

Jerusalem Post Staff

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres said yesterday that he felt "sorrow and shame" when he looked at Mordechai Vanunu while testifying in the Jerusalem District Court on Wednesday in the accused's trial.

Speaking on television's Erev Hadash, Peres added that Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir's order barring him from testifying on five particular subjects was entirely justified.

Jordan in Eretz Yisrael, Shamir tells Hungarian TV

Post Diplomatic Correspondent

Jordan is an integral part of Eretz Yisrael, but we have no aspirations of changing the current situation, Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir said in an interview with Hungarian Television yesterday.

Speaking to a Hungarian Television crew visiting here, Shamir said that Eretz Yisrael was divided 60 years ago by the British, and that the part west of the Jordan River must remain under Jewish rule.

In a meeting with the speaker of the Canadian House of Commons, John Fraser, Shamir said that Israel's status vis-a-vis the territories and the Palestinians is not one of occupier and occupied.

Unlike the British, who were a foreign occupier and left Palestine, or the French in Algeria and the Americans in Vietnam who returned their troops to their home country, said Shamir, we have nowhere else to go.

Hospital workers warn of sanctions

By JUDY SIEGEL

Government hospital clerks and maintenance workers announced yesterday that they will apply sanctions "within a few days" because of the government's failure to keep its promise to equalize their salaries and fringe benefits with those of their Kupat Holim counterparts.

Meanwhile, next week promises to be a bad one for the public health system.

The country's 350 anesthesiologists, who went on a one-day strike this week, threaten to cancel all non-emergency operations at two different hospitals each day.

The government hospital physicians are also due to start sanctions next week over their demands for overtime pay for working a second shift, similar to that won by Kupat Holim Clalit doctors a few weeks ago.

Syria persuades Iran to delay big winter push

NICOSIA – Syria has persuaded Iran to delay its long-anticipated winter offensive against Iraq and halt attacks on Kuwait in a bid to cool rising tension in the Gulf, Arab diplomatic sources reported yesterday.

The Syrian initiative, launched at the urging of Saudi Arabia, was aimed at buying time for a dialogue between Teheran and the six-member Gulf Cooperation Council aimed at finding a settlement to end the seven-year-old Gulf war.

There was no clear word from Teheran on what Syrian envoys have been able to negotiate in their mediation effort that began in late December.

But Gulf-based Arab diplomats and officials of the six-nation GCC told the Associated Press that Iran has been making "favourable gestures." They said the Iranians have indicated their willingness to open a dialogue and hold back on unleashing a new ground offensive against Iraq.

Diplomatic sources in Damascus said Saudi Arabia and the other GCC states have persuaded Iraq to curb its air strikes on Iranian tankers in the Gulf in recent days. That, in turn, has halted tit-for-tat Iranian attacks on neutral shipping in the waterway. The Iranians have been massing troops in the southern sector of the war front for weeks and have vowed to unleash "punishing blows" against Iraq.

Arab diplomatic sources in Damascus said the Iranians have assembled more than 500,000 men for the big push.

If the Syrian effort develops, it will mark a major breakthrough in Arab efforts to stop the war escalating and open the door to talks aimed at ending the conflict that has threatened to engulf other states in the strategic, oil-rich region.

Kuwait's English-language Arab Times daily noted on Wednesday: "A feeling of optimism is prevailing in Kuwait for a tangible progress toward an end of the Gulf war."

Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa, and in recent days, vice president Abdul-Halim Khaddam, have been shuttling between Teheran and Arab capitals in an effort to defuse the Gulf conflict. The involvement of Khaddam, one of Syrian President Hafez Assad's most trusted advisers, was seen as a clear sign of the seriousness of the Syrian mediation effort.

He and Sharaa are currently visiting Gulf capitals briefing Arab leaders on their talks in Teheran.

The Syrian initiative was seen as a key factor in an unexpectedly mild criticism of Iran by GCC leaders at their December 26-29 summit in Riyadh. "A new phase has started," one Damascus source stressed. "Iran and Saudi Arabia have already accepted that talks should be held either in Teheran or in Oman."

Saudi Arabia's Al-Sharq al-Awsat yesterday said the meeting would likely be held in Damascus at foreign minister level. "Iran has been very responsive," a knowledgeable source in Damascus commented. "So has Riyadh."

The Riyadh summit proposed sending envoys to Teheran to seek ways of ending the war in which by Western estimates more than 1 million people have been killed and 1.7m. wounded.

Syria, Iran's closest Arab ally, has been under mounting pressure from other Arab states to break its 5-year-old alliance with Teheran.

Assad has been reluctant to do that, arguing that it was more useful for him to use his influence with Teheran to scale down the war and find a formula for negotiations.

Saudi Arabia, Jordan and other Arab moderates have long been seeking to reconcile Syria with Iraq to end an 8-year-old rift that has seriously impaired Arab unity.

Some sources noted that Syria's mediation in the Gulf war stemmed in part from an effort to block Egypt's swelling influence in the region.

In another development, U.S. Defence Secretary Frank Carlucci began a tour of Washington's key Middle East ally, Saudi Arabia, yesterday amid reports that the U.S. is about to cut back its naval strength in the Gulf.

Western diplomats said Carlucci, conducting a wide-ranging review of U.S. policy, would seek to reassure Saudi Arabia that any reduction would not signal a weakening of Washington's support for moderate Gulf states.

Carlucci also planned to visit Oman, whose navy polices shipping in the Strait of Homuz, but that leg of the trip was cancelled because of his tight schedule. (AP, Reuter)

Saudis donate $10m. worth of food to hungry Lebanese

BEIRUT (Reuter) – Hundreds of aid workers relieved the misery of poverty-stricken Lebanese yesterday by starting to give away $10 million worth of food donated by Saudi Arabia's King Fahd.

The emergency supplies were distributed by the Hariri Foundation, a charity run by Lebanese-born Saudi businessman Rafik Hariri, a close friend of the Saudi monarch.

"Thank god there are still people thinking of us," said a mother of six, as she carried her food home in Moslem West Beirut. Others welcomed the relief trucks loaded with parcels of powdered milk, sugar, flour, beans and butter.

A foundation official said more than half a million families across Lebanon would receive the food during a 20-day distribution campaign.

At least 500 volunteers handed out the food parcels, said to contain enough to feed a family of six for one month.

The UN disaster relief organization has said about 250,0000 families are destitute, while the country will be short of about 100,000 tons of grains and cereals in 1988.

British security specialist linked to bomb detectors supplied to Syria

By JENNI FRAZER

LONDON – One of Britain's leading security specialists has been accused of being at the centre of a plot to smuggle equipment to Syria.

The London Evening Standard which broke the story yesterday, said that Tadeusz "Teddy" Sas, a wealthy businessman who is a former Westminster city councillor and magistrate, had been involved in the supply of three bomb detectors which found their way to a training camp just outside Damascus.

The bomb detectors can be used to to see if terrorist devices will pass security checks.

The Sas group of companies, based in Buckinghamshire, supplies defence and security equipment to armies and police forces all over the world. But when Teddy Sas was approached last May to supply the very latest model of explosives detector to a "Middle Eastern customer," who would require a demonstration to be held in Syria, there was already a Department of Trade ban on the export of such equipment to Syria. The ban followed the severing of relations between London and Damascus after the attempt to plant a bomb on an El Al plane in London.

The Standard claims that Sas set up the deal through a Palestinian, Hassan Zubaidi, who "admits he has had dealings with the Palestinian Liberation Organization." He is said to have offices in Damascus and Beirut.

The Sas company's intermediary claims not to have known that the security equipment was destined for a Damascus training camp. He told the Standard he thought the detectors were purchased to help the Lebanese security forces.

He avoided checks by putting the bomb detectors in his company car, driving to Dover and crossing to France by ferry, and then driving to Paris.

He is said to have arrived in Damascus from Paris with two explosive detectors and a military standard metal detector. One of the explosive detectors was the SA23 model and the other the HED.

Some weeks after leaving this equipment in Damascus, a Sas company representative returned with another detector, Analytical Instruments's Model 97, billed as "the world's most advanced explosives detector."

The representative's second journey followed the same route as the first and he left Model 97 in Damascus in return for a promised cheque. The payment was never made and the deal, ostensibly worth something like £1.6 million, fell through.

Chinese farmer 'puts hair back on 10,000 bald heads'

PEKING (Reuter) – A Chinese peasant is winning worldwide acclaim for a baldness cure he invented 20 years ago which has restored hair to some 10,000 people, the New China News Agency said yesterday.

Zhao Zhangguang, a 45-year-old farmer from Hubei province with only a primary school education, developed in his bedroom a liniment now used in 100 clinics throughout China, it said.

Last October Zhao won an award from a Brussels inventors convention and he has signed sales contracts with businessmen from 16 countries, the agency said. "In Tokyo, Osaka and Hongkong, beauty parlours are waiting for his medicine," it added.

The suicide of a woman neighbour suffering from baldness spurred Zhao to invent his cure. His family nearly went broke as he devoted himself to experiments, the report said. His search paid off when a bald friend found his hair growing back after a month of treatment with Zhao's liniment.

But not all of Zhao's customers are satisfied. His father said the remedy made him itchy and left part of his scalp red and swollen.

'Positive' signals from Soviets for Afghan peace

ISLAMABAD (Reuter) – Pakistan said yesterday it saw positive signals from the Soviet Union for peace in Afghanistan but Moslem guerrillas said they would not join Communists in any future government in Kabul.

Both statements followed remarks by Soviet Foreign Minister Eduard Shevardnadze in Kabul on Wednesday that Moscow wanted to withdraw its troops from Afghanistan in 1988 and that conditions for this were auspicious.

A Foreign Ministry spokesman told reporters, "We have noted the positive signals implicit in the statements of the Soviet leadership. Their translation into actions can assure a speedy settlement restoring the freedom and independence of a non-aligned Afghanistan friendly towards all its neighbours."

He said three days of talks between U.S. Undersecretary of State Michael Armacost and Pakistani officials, which ended on Wednesday confirmed both nations' commitment to the earliest possible settlement of the eight-year-old Afghan war.

Shevardnadze, who visited Kabul while Armacost was here, was quoted by the official Afghan news agency as saying, "We would like 1988 to be the last year of the presence of Soviet troops in your country."

Mohammad Younis Khalis, leader of a guerrilla alliance opposing the Soviet-backed Kabul government, said the sooner Soviet forces left Afghanistan the better it would be for Moscow.

"This will determine the future relationship between an Islamic government in Afghanistan and the Soviet Union," he said in a statement in the north-western Pakistani town of Peshawar.

Khalis said the alliance, which groups seven Pakistan-based guerrilla parties, would not join Communists in any future Afghan government.

This was a reference to Shevardnadze's remarks that Kabul's policy of "national reconciliation" launched in January last year had improved the international climate while the U.S.-Soviet summit last month had raised hopes for an Afghan settlement.

The Pakistani spokesman said UN mediator Diego Cordovez would arrive here on January 20.

22 hopefuls selected for Haiti's presidential poll

PORT-AU-PRINCE (Reuter) – Seven men alleged to have links with former Haitian dictator Jean-Claude "Baby Doc" Duvalier were included in an official list announced on Wednesday of 22 candidates for presidential elections later this month.

Official radio and TV stations on Wednesday night named 22 people selected by the military-picked provisional electoral commission. Seven candidates accused of connections with Duvalier had been rejected by an earlier electoral council. Missing were eight leading opposition politicians who are refusing to stand on January 17 to protest against the power of the military-led government in the ballotting process.

The boycotting opposition leaders have said the new poll violates Haiti's constitution. They object particularly to a new electoral law which allows authorities to inspect voters' ballots and permits soldiers to enter polling places. A delegation including three opposition leaders and two civilian groups on Wednesday asked the 13-nation Caribbean Community meeting in Barbados to send a peacekeeping force to monitor the polls.

The government rescheduled elections after gangs killed at least 34 people at polling booths on November 29 last year. The poll was intended to be the first free vote in 30 years after the overthrow of the Duvalier government in February 1986.

The list of candidates announced on Wednesday included seven who had stood in the November poll, seven who had been rejected from that election, and eight others.

The November poll was organized by a provisional electoral commission made up of representatives of nine social groups. It rejected candidates with links to Duvalier, but was forced to suspend the election and was later sacked by the military.

Teenager among four blacks killed in South Africa

JOHANNESBURG (AP) – Four blacks were killed in the latest round of factional fighting in Pietermaritzburg, where 31 people have died so far this year, police said yesterday.

A 14-year-old boy was fatally shot when a group of blacks entered the house where the youth was staying and opened fire, police said.

In a nearby township, an unidentified gunman fired a shot at a police vehicle. Police returned fire at a group of blacks and fatally shot a 21-year-old man, the report added.

Also, the bodies of two men were found stabbed to death in other townships, police said.

Almost 300 blacks have been killed in fights among black factions in Pietermaritzburg.

The power struggle involves the United Democratic Front, the nation's largest anti-apartheid organization, and Inkatha, a political group headed by Zulu leader Mangosuthu Buthelezi.

She is making a 24-hour stay after spending three days in Kenya.

Film star's widow assumes top post in Indian state

MADRAS, India (Reuter) – The widow of Indian film star politician M.G. Ramachandran was sworn in yesterday to succeed him as chief minister of the southern state of Tamil Nadu.

But Janaki Ramachandran and her seven-man interim cabinet have only three weeks to prove she can command a majority in the state assembly, and her tenure is bitterly opposed by her late husband's former leading lady and close companion, who claims to be general secretary of the party he founded.

Tamil Nadu, on India's southeastern tip, is home to 50 million ethnic Tamils and is a key factor in the search for peace in nearby Sri Lanka.

MGR, as he was known to millions of fans, died on December 24 after ruling the state for the past decade. He was one of the few figures with access both to the New Delhi government and to the militant Tamil leaders battling an Indian peace-keeping force on Sri Lanka. The new administration's policy on the issue has not yet been revealed. But whatever it is, Janaki Ramachandran faces formidable opposition from Jayalalitha, a former actress brought into politics by MGR.

Colombia hunts five drug mafia dons

BOGOTOA (AFP) – Colombian security forces have launched a manhunt for five reputed drug mafia kingpins – including the just-released Jorge Luis Ochoa – following the government's decision to issue arrest warrants for their extradition to the U.S., authorities said.

Ochoa, one of the leaders of the so-called Medellin cartel believed responsible for 80 per cent of the cocaine entering the U.S., was released last week from prison. The release was ordered by a Bogota judge who ruled that – counting time he had served in Spain – Ochoa had already served his 20-month sentence on charges of illegally importing Spanish fighting bulls.

The release of the reputed drug don caused outrage both here and in the U.S. The announcement by the Colombian government that it was seeking the arrest of the five sidesteps a Colombian Supreme Court ruling last year that a 1979 U.S.-Colombian extradition treaty was unconstitutional.

Instead, the government will base its effort on a multilateral extradition accord signed in Montevideo in 1933 which is still in effect between Washington and Bogota, legal experts said. The move comes after the U.S. government's announcement that the Customs Service would step up its surveillance of Colombian tourists and imports entering the U.S.

Meanwhile, the Colombian Foreign Ministry made a verbal protest to the U.S. Embassy on Wednesday against the imposition of delays in processing Colombian flowers and shrimp following Ochoa's release.

Foreign Minister Julio Londono said the protest was communicated to the business attache because U.S. Ambassador Charles Gillespie was absent. He did not give further details. The U.S. measure is already affecting tourism and Colombian exports to the U.S., according to officials here, with Colombian travel agencies and trade officials complaining the loudest.

Colombia's lucrative flower export trade is expected to be especially hard-hit. "Few people are buying tickets to travel to the U.S." since the announcement, one travel agent said here. And the director of the state-run Fund for Export Promotion called the steps a "clear violation of international trade" and noted that at the Tampa, Florida, airport, "banana shipments from Colombia are being rigorously scrutinized. Colombia's Civil Aeronautics Board said that Colombian cargo planes were being subjected to long unloading delays.

In an interview in Washington with State Department officials following the release, Colombian Ambassador Victor Mosquera Chaux reminded U.S. officials in Washington that the U.S.-Colombian 1979 extradition treaty had been ruled unconstitutional.

The arrest order issued late Tuesday to capture Ochoa, his brothers Fabio and Juan David Ochoa, former legislator Pablo Escobar and Gonzalo Rodriquez, alias "The Mexican," was viewed by many as a symbolic effort to appease public opinion and the U.S. government since once captured, their extradition would have to overcome numerous legal hurdles.

Under the 1979 extradition law, a suspect had to serve time in Colombia for convictions here before being extradited.

Self-discipline in the cause of peace

IN PERSON
BENNY MORRIS

"He didn't try to tell me what I ought to think, he didn't lecture me," says John Fraser, the speaker of Canada's House of Commons, of his meeting yesterday with Prime Minister Shamir.

While emphasizing Canada's commitment to Israeli "territorial integrity" and to this country living within secure and recognized boundaries, Fraser stressed to Shamir the deep concern of Canadians "over questions of human rights."

In the territories? "Yes, in the territories and, I would include, in the Soviet Union." Fraser repeatedly declared his long-standing commitment and activism regarding Soviet Jewry.

And how did Shamir react? "He accepted this [Canadian concern about human rights]. He said: 'I know.' "

But Fraser consistently avoided any direct, explicit criticism of Israel or its policies in the territories. "Friendship is tested when your friends are in trouble, no? That is why this visit is very important, even if it is in a difficult time."

Fraser declined to comment on the behaviour of another visitor to the Holy Land, British Minister of State at the Foreign Office David Mellor. "I know that I've been here a week and have created no incident. It's not my place to [do so]. I don't officially represent the Canadian government here and I do represent the three parties in [the Canadian] parliament. I've tried to be useful to the cause of peace and harmony – and that sometimes takes self-discipline."

While here, Fraser met two Palestinian leaders, Al Fajr editor Hanna Seniora and Bethlehm Mayor Elias Freij. He brought them letters and regards from several people in Canada.

Was he touched by what they told him of the Palestinians' plight? Fraser carefully says that he is "touched" by the problems of both peoples in the area. "None with any sensitivity can be not touched [by the problems]."

Fraser then spoke of the $500,000 Canada annually provides the Palestinians and of the $25,000 cheque he brought and delivered to the Palestinians' association for the blind. This, he said was "the practical, pragmatic way of saying we're trying to help."

Canadians' views on the area, Fraser then implied, were greatly coloured by the problem of "terrorism. Canadians watch the Middle East with great concern. Terrorism is something we cannot stomach. We have had attacks – on the Turkish Embassy in Ottawa and on an Air India flight out of Canada. To Canadians, terrorism is the most disgusting thing imaginable."

Were Canadians affected by the recent troubles in the territories that they see daily on their TV screens? "We view Israel as a country of high idealism and lofty purposes. So if there is something that seems to draw criticism, there is a sense of dismay. Canadians expect the highest standards of Israelis. They wouldn't be shocked if someone else did [these things]. So if Israel is criticized, Canadians are shocked. Canadians know that Israel's is the only democratic government in the Middle East. Israel has a free press."

Fraser, a former minister of environment and minister of fisheries, was in Israel previously in 1973 and 1977. He described as the high points of his current visit a meeting with a recent oleh from the Soviet Union, a retired Red Army colonel, whom Fraser had campaigned for since 1980; and a day spent with the Nature Reserves Authority, touring the headwaters of the Jordan, and the Hula and Mount Carmel. "I was profoundly affected by the fact that this country , with all its problems, had the wisdom to concern itself with the problem of preserving wildlife."

None of the Israelis he spoke to, said Fraser, left him with the impression that "they are sanguine. I didn't get the sense that anyone is just waiting around for time to take care of things."

Walking me to the door, Fraser said, with deep conviction: "Your country has a lot of friends in my country, a lot of friends."

NO LECTURE – John Fraser with Shamir yesterday.

Woman in each department to deal with complaints

Sexual harassment soon to be defined a disciplinary offence in civil service

By ASHER WALLFISH
Post Knesset Correspondent

The civil service regulations will soon include a new rule defining sexual harassment as a disciplinary offence, Civil Service Commissioner Meir Gabbai told the Knesset Labour and Social Affairs Committee this week.

A woman official would be named in each government department, responsible for receiving and handling complaints about sexual harassment, he said.

Committee chairwoman Ora Namir said that the Equal Job Opportunities Law now being prepared in her committee would define sexual harassment as a criminal offence as well.

Namir said that the atmosphere in the current trial in Jerusalem of a civil servant accused of sexual harassment had persuaded her that the solution to the problem lay in new legislation and not in seeking court judgements under existing legislation.

The committee was told that most of the victims of sexual harassment were unmarried women or heads of single-parent families, and that in more than one out of every four cases the harasser was the direct superior of the victim.

Culprit who implanted 'cancer' in HU computer 'not likely to be caught'

Post Science and Health Reporter

A computer programme containing an apparently intentional "bug" that gobbles up computer memory, last week almost forced Hebrew University computer experts to shut down the system.

University experts verified the existence of the computer error, which acts like a "cancer" in its destructive, multiplying effect. But they downplayed the report by Ma'ariv which suggested that high-IQ soldiers taking part in the university's Talpiot computer programme had been involved.

HU computer security head Avraham Gagin told The Jerusalem Post that "we have absolutely no reason at all to suspect the soldiers. It will be exceedingly difficult to identify the culprit, and I doubt if we'll ever find him."

The "bug" got into the university's system of 1,000 personal computers through a faulty diskette which instructs the computer to copy the programme in a very short time. Every time the programme is run through a computer, it multiplies and uses up more of the computer's existing memory.

Students at the HU computer science department, says Gagin, were the first to suspect the problem, as programmes they were working on went through the computer very slowly.

The error was discovered on Wednesday last week, and by working around the clock, computer expert were able to "destroy" it two days later.

Gagin says it was the first time such a trick had been tried in Israel, to the best of his knowledge. There is no way to protect computers against all such "bugs" but experts can programme their computers to deal with each one that has been discovered.

Gagin explained that the illegal but common practice in Israel of copying diskettes was responsible for the quick proliferation of the "bug".

The police were not called in by the university, even though the damage caused is a criminal violation.

Giacomo Girolamo, better known as Casanova, claims to have invented the modern-day lottery.

According to his memoirs, his reputation as an alchemist was at stake when he was asked by the then-king of France whether the greatest lover in the world could also create the greatest fortune in the world.

With characteristic aplomb, Casanova, then a guest in France and persona non grata in several city-states throughout the rest of the continent, answered with little hestitation. "You ask me for 10 million francs. I can give you 100 million." And he did, creating the Royal French Lottery, a numbers guessing game.

His downfall in Paris came when the 1 per cent of the take that the king promised him proved insufficient, and he couldn't keep his hands off the coins, which belonged to the king.

But that didn't stop other countries from using the invention, which Casanova, having at least academic if not temporal integrity, credited to Nero, whose door prizes were usually slaves.

The British, for example, used a lottery to pay for their first colonial settlement in the New World, a place called Jamestown, named for King James, unlike Ariel, which is not named for Ariel Sharon.

There's something poetic about the greatest romantic lover in history resurrecting the most popular gambling game in the world from the Romans. After all, one of the darker sides of love might be described as getting something for nothing.

The obsessiveness with which a committed football pool player goes after the grand prize bears a certain similarity to the greatest obsession of all – unrequited love.

Toto devotion

Robert Rosenberg

Pools players like those yesterday at the restaurant at the corner of Yehuda Halevi and Allenby, plot, scheme and stay awake at night calculating all the various possibilities in much the same manner as an adolescent obsessed with the class prince or princess wonders at night about how the object of his or her affection dresses or undresses.

Imagination runs rampant thinking about what would happen if victory was actually handed over, as all victories in both gambling and love seem to be given to winners, on a silver platter. Like love, the football pools offer up the illusion that there was some intellectual or emotional effort, a calculation of seduction, an effort to tempt fate.

At the restaurant yesterday, several men struggled with the search for the winning combination. Across the street, gold-toothed Georgians tried to talk passersby into buying or selling foreign currency, but even there, outside the Allenby post office, the main topic of conversation in between the "psst, dollars, marks, yen" was Toto.

Sami is convinced that the thing to do is to imagine the voice of the TV broadcaster on Saturday night, reciting in a peculiarly familiar rhythm the ones, twos and X's.

He concentrates, his eyes squinched into wrinkles that seem to continue naturally up his forehead into a receding hairline. The forehead wrinkles shift like erratic wavelets on the beach of his thinning hair as he believes he hears the voice from tomorrow night. And then he carefully marks the boxes.

He won't listen to the radio tomorrow during the day. He'll wait for the TV to report the results.

Yosef admits that Sami's actually won a few times – "nothing big, but something," – but Yosef's system is much more professional.

"I study the sports pages. I see who's beaten whom. I check the weather. I keep records. See?"

And he pulls out of a pocket of the army overcoat that he never returned after a miluim sometime in the early 70s a sheaf of newspaper clippings and yellowing notebook pages covered with an obsessively tiny, tight handwriting, listing the teams, weather conditions, health conditions and everything else that he puts into his calculations.

There are, of course, spoilsports who note that more and more often the pots are record-sized, meaning that more and more people are trying their luck, more and more people have been seduced by dreams, and that it's a sign of something deeper, a malaise.

But Sami and Yosef have been doing the football pools for years, as has Aviva Gal-Or, a secretary who developed a system that for the last 20 years has given her an almost regular income of a couple of hundred shekels a week.

Sami and Yosef have heard rumours of people who spend hundreds, thousands of shekels on permutations worked out either according to magic or according to the populist esoterica of the sports pages.

There's the story of the woman in Rehovot, a 35-year-old mother of two, who three weeks ago played Toto for the first time and won NIS8. The kiosk owner said try again, and she did, winning NIS180. He told her she seemed lucky, and she reinvested her money, winning NIS201,000 last week. She's waiting to see what happens this week.

And there's a story about a computer whiz who has found a corner of the Defence Ministry computers to calculate everything including wind speeds.

These are not people who wonder about the larger significance of shnorr, the something-for-nothing attitude that like any vice clamps unrelentingly onto the envious soul, and which sometimes seems to be at the dark, self-centred and pretentious heart of this little city on the provincial western fringes of the empire.

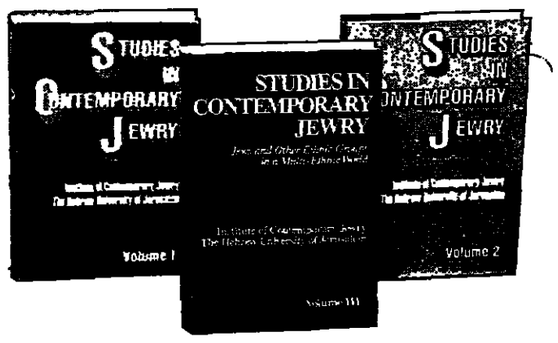

But Sami, who says he's an IDF invalid "with papers" and therefore is unable to do physical labour, which is about all that's available because he didn't get past eighth grade, is aware of something.

He looks out the restaurant window, which looks as if it's never been cleaned of either the smoke and grease created on the inside by the cooking, or on the outside by the fumes of exhaust. There's a large Mercedes pulling up at the corner by the money changer's, and in a moment, one of the money changers is in the car, which pulls away into traffic heading south toward Jaffa.

"The rich don't care about you and me," he says, and then he looks around at his friends and enemies at the formica tables in the corner restaurant. "But when I win, I'll care. I promise."

Casanova would have understood. Sami. Lovers always make promises about the future. Just like Toto.

U.S. AID

As a result, Israel, like the other ESF recipients, is now required to maintain a separate account and keep track of the exact use of the entire $1.2b., which Israeli Finance Ministry and Bank of Israel officials view as a bureaucratic nightmare.

"This is a very important matter for us," an Israeli official said yesterday. He warned that instituting the changes would set Israeli banking practices back "some 30 years." He also said that the process of "privatizing" the Israeli economy -- strongly advocated by the U.S. government as part of a package of proposed economic reforms -- would also become considerably more difficult.

The matter was raised by Finance Minister Moshe Nissim during his visit to Washington in October. On November 17, Finance Ministry Director-General Victor Medina discussed the issue with the Americans during a follow-up visit to Washington.

Some lawmakers had been concerned about how these funds were being used in the Philippines, Haiti and elsewhere. There was suspicion of graft.

Representative Lee Hamilton (Democrat, Indiana) who is chairman of the House Foreign Affairs Subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East, last year raised separate questions about Egypt's use of ESF money to repay its outstanding Foreign Military Sales (FMS) loans to the U.S. Lawyers for the U.S. government disagree whether ESF money can legally be used in that way.

Israel, U.S. legislators agree, was not the target of the new restrictions. They insist that there was never any question about whether Israel was using its funds properly. They note that Israel continues to import considerably more commercial goods and services from the U.S. than it exports.

Because Israel had received its entire 1987 fiscal year $1.2 b. allocation early in October, 1986 – before the new legislation was passed – it was not restricted by the law last year, as were other countries receiving the ESF cash transfers, such as Egypt, Portugal and Turkey. Israel last year did not have to keep the money in a segregated account.

Israeli officials and their supporters tried desperately, but failed, to win an exemption for Israel as part of the 1988 fiscal year programme during the final days of this most recent session of Congress. Israeli officials are still hoping that Congress will approve legislation in the coming months exempting Israel from the auditing restrictions. But barring that, they hope that the administration will at least adopt interpretative rules making the restrictions less bureaucratically onerous for Israel.

Meanwhile, the $1.2 b. remains frozen. The separate $1.8 b. in military grants appropriated for Israel as part of the 1988 fiscal year foreign aid bill is not affected by the restrictions.

reasons why I wish to see an end to the Israeli occupation of the territories is because of my support for the state of Israel as well as my belief in the self-determination of the Palestinian people."

Kaufman said his discussions in Amman, which included a meeting with King Hussein, had covered both the Gulf war and the current unrest on the West Bank. He described the Jordanian attitude as "very sensible and balanced."

He said the Jordanians were very much in favour of an international peace conference "which in fact almost everybody is in favour of. The only people who don't seem to be in favour of it are the Likud section of your government and the U.S. which pays a certain amount of lip-service to it but doesn't do anything active." He said the international conference was important because "neither Jordan nor any other Arab country can come to a bilateral arrangement with Israel."

Kaufman said he will pass on the Jordanian views to the Israeli officials he will meet next week, including Prime Minister Shamir and the political director-general of the Foreign Ministry, Dr. Yossi Beilin. But he took pains to stress that he has come to Israel to hold discussions, not lay down instructions.

Kaufman met Histadrut secretary-general Yisrael Kessar yesterday at the opening of an international conference here hosted by the Israel labour movement.

Kessar told Kaufman that he is in favour of an international conference so long as it is clear that the status of Jerusalem is not under negotiation. The labour federation leader told Kaufman that territorial compromise is the only solution to the present problem.

Kaufman asked Kessar why Labour leader Shimon Peres did not break up the National Unity government before the rotation took place. Kessar said that he himself had urged Peres to do this but Peres chose not to heed his advice.

BARAM

head the elections campaign.

Baram told the bureau yesterday that he had reached his "difficult" decision to resign after much soul-searching. He said he had no complaints against the party and that he intended to keep his Knesset seat. He asked that the bureau call for a meeting of the party Central Committee in order to choose the next secretary-general.

The bureau responded by immediately adopting a proposal by Energy Minister Moshe Shahal – who recently bickered with Baram over the manning of the party's elections staff management – to reject Baram's proposal and to "demand" that he withdraw his statement.

Rabin and most of the party's ministers, MKs and top officials, urged Baram yesterday to retract his decision. Party sources said that a possible candidate to replace Baram would be Mordechai Gur, although they expressed confidence that Baram's decision was reversible.

Baram refused last night to comment on the reasons for his resignation. Asked if his decision was final, Baram said cryptically "at this moment, yes."

Some party figures, who are considered to be very close to Baram, said that he had recently said that he was "fed up" with the state of the country, the government and the party. "Contrary to what you may believe, politicians sometimes simply have enough," one said.

Baram said in an interview that he did not feel that his step would harm Labour's election campaign since there was still ample time for the party to regroup and reorganize.

But party sources expressed deep concern that if the Baram crisis was not resolved quickly, the party could be plunged into a turmoil involving organizational issues. Perhaps more dangerously, it could bring the always tense relations between the dovish and hawkish wings of the party to a boiling point.

Baram's relations with Peres – who did not support Baram's candidacy for his current post – have never been close, party sources said yesterday, adding that Baram has been increasingly dissatisfied with Peres's handling of Labour's policies in general and of relations with the Likud in the national unity government in particular.

Ill feelings between the two increased in the past weeks after Peres suggested that Deputy Agriculture Minister Avraham Katz-Oz be appointed director-general of the elections campaign, in addition to Baram as chairman. Peres backed down from the proposal after hearing Baram's flat refusal to entertain the notion. Baram said that he would see the move as a gesture of no-confidence in him.

Peres met with Baram late last night and is scheduled to meet him on again on Saturday. Peres will attempt to persuade Baram to change his mind, to avert a serious party rupture at the start of an elections year.

SINIORA

tempt to find another way."

Foreign Minister Peres dismissed Siniora's call saying that all of the "important" West Bank mayors had loudly objected to civil disobedience.

The Palestinian scepticism over Siniora's campaign stems from the fact that the Al-Fajr editor has lost much of his grassroots support recently, partly because of his absence during the recent unrest, as well as previous maverick political moves like an announcement that he might run in the Jerusalem city council elections.

Siniora said he didn't mind launching the campaign virtually alone — non-violence activist Mubarak Awad being the only other figure openly backing him.

"Mr. Gandhi started with boycotting salt," Siniora said. "We start with boycotting cigarettes. The next step in the coming weeks will be Israeli soft drinks."

on the Mount of Olives and Atarot in northern Jerusalem.

At about 1:20 p.m., an Egged bus number 25 was stoned in the Shuafat area while on its way to the northern Jerusalem neighbourhood of Neveh Ya'acov. A 17-year-old girl travelling on the bus was lightly injured and treated at Hadassah Hospital Mt. Scopus.

Five Palestinians were arrested following the incident.

The commercial strike in East Jerusalem frustrated city officials, who claim that Arab storekeepers do not want to close their shops but are coerced into doing so by threats from young people.

"I don't know why they [the merchants] are doing it," said Amir Cheshin, the mayor's adviser on Arab affairs. "They are ruining themselves. One Arab merchant told me that he was going to the Mahane Yehuda market [in West Jerusalem] to buy vegetables for his family because everything in East Jerusalem was closed."

The commercial strike included Ramallah, Al-Ram, and, for the first time, Jericho. Light disturbances were reported in Ramallah and Al-Ram. A curfew was imposed on Jalazoun after a petrol bomb was thrown on an Israeli car.

In Gaza, loudspeaker calls for Holy War were voiced from a number of mosques during evening prayer yesterday as a spreading wave of renewed disturbances hit at least six refugee camps throughout the area.

Security forces have been placed on special alert for threatened unrest after mosque services later today.

The focus of yesterday's disturbances was the town of Rafiah on the Egyptian border, where large crowds of youths constructed barricades on main throughfares, burned tyres, and hurled debris at IDF troops. Security forces arrested a number of demonstrators.

Other incidents were reported in Khan Yunis and Beit Hanun.

The Southern Command advisory committee, reviewing the pending deportation of four Gazans, completed the plea phase of its hearings yesterday. Military sources said the recommendation would be made in the middle of next week.

The impact of unrest in the territories on Election '88

Bradley Burston

Broken glass and tyre-ash have their influence. (Elharar / Scoop 80)

FOR SEVERAL weeks in succession, political seismographs the world over have done a frenzied St. Vitus blur tracing the impact of Gaza and West Bank unrest on the future of the Palestinian national movement.

Bleary-eyed Foreign Ministry officials have been inundated with demands for assessments of the possible consequences and power-balance repercussions of the insurrection-by-any-other-name.

Nearly lost, it seems, in the Israeli government's resolute public stance of business as usual and the ubiquitous portrayals of the events of "Flaming December" as a Palestinian watershed, are readable signs of the influence of the broken glass and the tyre ash on the political geomorphology of the country itself.

But the wave of unrest has already had considerable effect on the internal dynamics of the national unity government's major partners, insists veteran Likud campaign manager MK Gidon Gadot.

"If you noticed this week during the Knesset debate on no-confidence motions from the left and the right, instead of defending the government's position, [Likud MK Eliahu] Ben-Elissar attacked the Alignment, and [Alignment MK David] Libai attacked the Likud.

"The coming election is likely to markedly differ from previous campaigns," Gadot believes, because, for the first time, it may take on the colours of a popular national referendum on the issue of the territories.

"Israeli election campaigns have generally been based on past achievements or failings," says Gadot. "The election this fall will concern the principal immediate and future problems, the Arab question and the question of the fate of the Land of Israel."

Though Israeli polls have indicated that the initial effect of the unrest was an overall lurch to the right coupled with a paralysis of confusion on the part of the Israeli left, some analysts believe that further, perhaps lasting, electoral shifts are in the offing.

'A flight to the fringe parties'

According to Tel Aviv political strategist Nile Sahar, both the Likud and the Alignment are at mounting risk of losing votes as the current unrest continues. "The major parties are increasingly seen in the public mind as being 'dragged along at the mercy of events,' rather than taking appropriate action to control the course of events," Sahar observes.

The Israeli electorate senses that because of the present government, Israel is losing its integrity, losing a knowledge of what it stands for and is demonstrating ongoing helplessness in decision-making, Sahar continues. "It's only natural, therefore, that marginal parties, both of the left and of the right, with clearly defined positions, can be expected to absorb and benefit from much of the 'dissatisfaction vote.'

"On the whole, the public sees the Likud and the Alignment as feeding and propagating the problems, not solving them," says Sahar. But the loss to the major parties may not stop with a flight to the fringes. "There is a distinct possibility that in the coming election, the percentage of abstentions – eligible voters who 'choose not to make a choice' – will be very high indeed."

In Sahar's view, the best chance for one of the major parties to score a meaningful victory in the November contest is to depart radically from their established positions on the questions of peace and the territories, towards what Sahar terms a "synthesis of right- and left-wing views."

ARE THE MAJOR partners in the government willing to take such a step? A recent initiative by one Labour activist has cast a measure of doubt on the possibility.

Last Friday, Micha Goldman, a United Kibbutz Movement figure associated with Labour's Yitzhak Rabin camp, proposed that Israeli law be extended to the areas specified by the Allon Plan (in particular, the region bordering the Jordan River).

Though Goldman was quick to point out that the plan avoided areas of dense Palestinian population ("Gaza is a cancer, like Lebanon, and I wouldn't be at all sorry to see Nablus go, and Hebron as well"), Alignment leaders publicly blasted the proposal, calling it at best a publicity stunt and at worst a licence for outright annexation of the whole of the territories and the death knell to any hope for peace negotiations.

"People with Likud views," said Minister of Immigration and Absorption Ya'acov Tsur, "should stay in the Likud." The withering criticism notwithstanding, Goldman maintains that the proposal not only constitutes a persuasive alternative to annexing the territories but also, stands the best chance of capturing a broad "consensus of Israeli public opinion – including, he hastens to add, a surprisingly large proportion of Alignment leaders.

Goldman states that from 1977 on, the Alignment has consistently been losing the votes of young Israelis and of veteran Labour voters who believe in what he calls "a more activist approach."

He says that, "while these two groups drifted away to other parties, no new voters came to take their place, and the Alignment was pictured more and more either as a party without clear policies or as a 'Yossi Saridist' movement.

"We have to come to grips with the fact that the young people of this country are oriented, by and large, from the centre to the right. They want consistency from their leaders, not the zig-zags we've been offering."

SOME OBSERVERS feel that recent polls showing Yitzhak Rabin climbing in popularity while Shimon Peres's star appears on the wane indicate that, along with an identification with Rabin's tough response to unrest, the defence minister is perceived as being more consistent in his positions than Peres.

"The feeling now," observes one Labour veteran, "is that especially after Peres's somewhat ill-timed remark on demilitarizing Gaza and the moribund state of the international peace conference concept, it's time to move away from a lukewarm approach emphasizing flexibility and towards determination and consistency."

If consistency is indeed what prospective Labourites feel is lacking, an opposite problem may be afflicting the Likud. "With all due respect to Prime Minister Shamir," says a prominent Negev Herut Party official, "his image, especially among young people, is that of the guardian of a status quo they're not sure they like. It's a parve arrangement, neither here nor there. They do like Shamir, especially his ability to tell off the rest of the world, but they find it hard to identify with him."

What they would prefer, he argues, is someone with more spontaneity than Shamir, someone with a flair for unpredictability and action.

He pauses for a moment and smiles. "Someone like Ariel Sharon. You never know what to expect of him."

For political party analysts, Sharon has long represented the unpredictable, non-disposable wild card of the electoral deck. In 1973, he conceived of a political party constellation that would take the name Likud. Two years later, he crossed party lines to become then-premier Rabin's special adviser for security issues. After another two years had passed, he had bolted both Rabin and the Likud for his independent Shlomzion list, at the outset so dovish a construction that at one point Sharon offered Yossi Sarid the second position on the party list and instructed leftist author Amos Kenan to set up a meeting between himself and Yassir Arafat.

Standing Sharon in good stead from a recent public opinion standpoint has been his reputation for having been the imaginative if brutal OC Southern Command who "established the rule of order" in the terror-ridden Gaza Strip in 1971, and the high political profile he has maintained in recent weeks, dedicating his Jerusalem Moslem Quarter apartment in defiance of demonstrators.

Ariel Sharon's primary asset

PERHAPS Sharon's primary asset is the liquid nature of his position on Israel's borders. At several points in his career, Sharon has urged that Israel assist the Palestinian people in overthrowing Jordan's King Hussein in order to establish an East Bank Palestinian state, and the attractiveness of his proposal to a significant portion of the Israeli right is not lost on those of his supporters who believe that the former general can command a broad front, including even a significant number of religious voters.

Says the Negev Herutnik, "Only Sharon has the wiles and the reputation for ruthlessness necessary to make peace in this region." Through it all, however, veteran party pols tend to discount the effect of the current turmoil on the November balloting.

"In the final analysis," says Likud MK Ehud Olmert, "most Israeli voters tend to draw conclusions from events such as these according to their already-established political points of view. Hawks remain hawkish, doves stay dovish."

Olmert also rejects the view that young Likudniks favour the replacement of Shamir with a figure less associated with the status quo.

"Shamir's standing as head of the party is rock-solid," says Olmert.

Still, in Olmert's opinion, the younger members of the Likud list constitute the party's single greatest electoral asset. "The Likud presently has a large number of people with the potential to become the next generation of the leadership of this country. This, it seems to me, is an advantage that means a great deal to the public."

LABOUR PARTY secretary-general Uzi Bar-Am, while allowing that the large parties may have lost a measure of strength in the short term, argues that as elections near, the left, and in particular the Citizen's Rights Movement, will lose votes to the Alignment, while the rightist Tehiya Party will lose votes to the Likud.

"This is because, for a large portion of the Israeli voting public, what is most important is who will form the government. As they enter the polling booth, this takes precedence over a 100 per cent identification factor with a small party."

Bar-Am also believes that the abstention factor will be negligible in the 1988 race. "In past elections we have reached a particularly high voting percentage. There were elections one July, during which a large sector of the voting public was abroad, and even so, the percentage reached 78 per cent. If you add to this the number who were overseas, you get 86 per cent."

The view that the Alignment has lost the youth vote is also mistaken, Bar-Am argues: "At this point, there is a much greater balance between the major parties with reference to young voters than in the past. In high school polls taken in the last two years from Netanya to Rehovot, Labour came in first place consistently – although, if you added the Likud and Tehiya votes together, they topped ours."

Bar-Am cites the Israeli Arab vote as a special target of the Labour campaign this year. "I think we will have to wait for a period of calm to analyse the situation, but if the Alignment can attract four or five mandates from the Arab sector, it will be a significant advantage.

Given the apparent inability of either major party to score a significant electoral victory and thus extricate itself from the coalition called National Unity, is there any reasonable expectation for a real change in 1988 voting patterns?

There is, replies one of Israel's more experienced party tacticians, but only if different contenders are selected to head the title card.

"If Shamir goes against Peres again, there's no reason for anything to turn out differently. But if, for example, they send Sharon against Ezer Weizmann, something will, in fact, take place.

"The reason is simple. Voters prefer black and white and red to shades of grey or pink. By sending Sharon against Ezer Weizmann, you force a situation of movement toward the extremes which, whether you like it not, is an essential element in campaign processes.

"People will say they prefer a cultured, quiet election campaign, but those who know campaigns from the inside know there's no such thing. There are only campaigns between grey candidates, or campaigns where the candidates are very clear in their views."

This is not to suggest that Shamir is unclear in his views, he continues, "but he simply doesn't talk. Peres's problem is different, of course. He is unclear because he talks so much. That is why Begin, who seemed to speak extremely clearly, was able to score so well against him in the early Eighties."

'Comfortable deal' for Labour and Likud

But Citizen's Rights Movement MK Yossi Sarid, himself a former major party campaign manager, suggests that neither the Likud nor the Alignment has a fundamental interest in disturbing the present coalition arrangement.

"Despite appearances to the contrary, it's possible that in practice, they truly love the national unity government. The arrangement is no mean luxury for them, after all. On the one hand, Shimon Peres can tour the world as a rational, realistic peacemaker without having to pay any domestic price or lift a finger to implement his views. He can wail, 'Look, I want this badly, but the Likud won't let me have it.'

"The Likud also benefits. They can be in nominal charge, have ministers and what have you, without winning the election or paying the price for the policies they advocate. They love this, when all is said and done."

Widespread sense of unease among American Jews

Wolf Blitzer / WASHINGTON
and Walter Ruby / NEW YORK

A SPLIT in the American Jewish community has clearly helped the Reagan administration to openly distance itself from Israel's actions in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, culminating this week with U.S. support for a UN Security Council resolution calling on Israel not to deport Palestinians.

Top White House and State Department officials have no problem finding prominent American Jewish leaders who have publicly criticized Israeli policies.

These officials recognize that there is a widespread sense of unease among American Jews, a feeling stemming in part from the serious beating that Israel receives virtually every day in the American media. The television news networks in particular have painted a very nasty picture of Israel.

Morris Abram, chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, can maintain that the Jewish community remains solid in its support for Israel. Seymour Reich, president of B'nai B'rith International, can make the same case. But their claims cannot conceal the cracks which have surfaced in recent weeks.

In private, these cracks have been especially welcomed by many Middle East specialists in the State Department whose influence on the Washington decision-making process has been enhanced in recent weeks. It is certainly easier for the U.S. government to differ publicly with Israel when American Jewish leaders are doing the same.

The split was evident the other night when Rita Hauser, a well-known Jewish activist in New York, challenged Abram on a nationally-televised news programme. Three weeks earlier, Rabbi Alexander M. Schindler, president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations (Reform), had bluntly criticized Israeli policies. Schindler is himself a former chairman of the Presidents' Conference.

During private conversations, Israeli officials have acknowledged the impact of this weakening of American Jewish support for Israel, saying they have already felt its damaging effects. They insist, for example, that the Reagan administration would have been much more reluctant to vote this week against Israel at the UN Security Council if the Jewish community had shown solid support for Israel.

But the days when American Jewish leaders are willing to endorse any policy accepted by Israel appear to be over. An Israeli ambassador in Washington can no longer meet the Presidents' Conference in New York behind closed doors and expect all the troops to fall into line. They have to be convinced that Israel is doing the right thing.

In recent years, there has been increasing scepticism among American Jews; they are no longer certain that the official Israeli answer is necessarily right. They have seen too many Israeli blunders, such as the invasion of Lebanon, and they have been deeply embarrassed by too many scandals, including Pollard, Irangate and the Shin Bet.

Furthermore, they have been deeply and personally pained by Israel's continued refusal to grant full religious rights to non-Orthodox Jews. It should come as no great surprise that loving and devoted supporters of Israel are voicing their concern.

MANY U.S. Jewish leaders have expressed sharp disappointment at the Reagan administration for its UN Security Council vote. But they have also stressed that this latest manifestation of continuing U.S. disapproval of Israeli actions in trying to put down Palestinian riots will not have a major impact on the U.S.-Israel relationship.

"We are disappointed by this vote, but see it as no more than a blip in the overall relationship," remarked Abe Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith. "The U.S. vote is misguided and will help those who seek gains at Israel's expense without negotiations for peace...

"But it is not as though [the administration] is looking for reasons or excuses to condemn Israel. They are responding to different manifestations of events that have been occurring [in Israel]. The new factor was deportation, and they felt they had to respond."

Arguing that "there has been no change in overall U.S. policy towards Israel," Foxman expressed optimism that "there will now be a lowering of profile" on U.S. criticism of Israel.

Michael Pelavin, chairman of the National Jewish Community Relations Advisory Council said: "We are obviously disappointed with this vote and would have preferred an abstention. It is certainly disturbing to see the PLO calling the shots in the Security Council...

"But I see this as no more than a bump in the road that will not interfere with the longterm U.S.-Israeli relationship. I believe that both the U.S. and Israel are committed to... sitting down and working out a political solution."

Morris Abram, chairman of the Presidents' Conference, issued a statement that expressed disappointment "at the action of our government in joining the UN Security Council vote, which will not advance the cause of peace. Calling on Israel to refrain from punishing the ringleaders of the violence will only encourage further violence."

He added, "When Jordan deported thousands of Palestinian and PLO terrorists during Black September, the council was silent."

Hizbullah's road to Beirut – via Baghdad and Jerusalem

CONTRARY TO common belief, the Shi'ite Hizbullah of Lebanon do not have as their immediate or medium-range aim the transformation of that country into an Islamic Republic. That will be attempted only after Iraq and Palestine are "liberated" by Hizbullah's Iranian patrons/allies.

This was one of the main points made by Martin Kramer, of Tel Aviv University's Dayan Centre, in a paper delivered at this week's three-day international conference there on "The Iranian Revolution and the Moslem World."

For the Hizbullah, which sprang up in the wake of the 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon,says Kramer, "human history may be divided into two eras: that which preceded the Islamic Revolution in Iran, and that which will follow it."

The Hizbullah understand that their – and Lebanon's – destiny is inextricably linked to that of the Iranian Revolution. They can ultimately have no existence, let alone success, without the success of the Iranians, first against Baghdad and then against Jerusalem.

As Hussayn al-Musawi, a leading Lebanese Shi'ite preacher, put it in an interview in 1986, "a prerequisite for establishing Islamic government in Beirut is victory over the Zionist regime...On the other hand, as long as the banners of Islam do not wave over Baghdad...the establishment of Islamic rule in Lebanon is not likely."

For Hizbullah, says Kramer, "the Iranian claim that the Gulf War is the first step toward the liberation of Jerusalem is not a rhetorical one."

He continues to cite Musawi, saying that according to him, the Iranian Revolutionary Guards in Lebanon – about 1,500 – "are under orders not to engage Israel directly." They will do so, they will be "the vanguard of the holy struggle which will liberate Jerusalem, once victory is achieved in the Gulf."

The aim of the Hizbullah, Musawi said, is to create an "all-encompassing Islamic state," which will include Lebanon, rather than merely an Islamic Republic of Lebanon.

Kramer quotes another Hizbullah leader-preacher, Ibrahim al-Amin,as saying that Lebanon's agony will persist until the final Middle East map is drawn. "We seek Almighty God's help in drawing this map as soon as possible...The blood of the martyrs who wage the jihad will end Lebanon's agony."

Thus, says Kramer, the Hizbullah reject nationalism, both Persian and Arab,"which divides the Moslem community along artificial lines."

Indeed, according to him, when their leaders talk of "the Arabs," they usually mean to deride. And he quotes a third Hizbullah leader-cleric, Sheikh Subhi al-Tufayli,as saying: "The Arabs for a long time have wanted peace with Israel." The Arabs generally bear responsibility for the corruption of Islam.

IN HIS PAPER, "The Pan-Islamic Premise of Hizbullah," Kramer tries to unravel the complex relationship between the Hizbullah and Iran, which is far from being the straight client-patron relationship of common understanding. There is no single institutional channel of contact or control between Iran and the Party of God:

There is "a great deal... of operational coordination" between Hizbullah and Iran, he asserts. At any given time there are some 1,500 Revolutionary Guards (Pasdaran) in the Bekaa Valley and near Tyre.

He singles out Sheikh Muhammad Husayn Fadlallah, often identified as Hizbullah's supreme leader, as the pre-eminent embodiment of Hizbullah's "independent mind."

HIZBULLAH'S SUPREME LEADER – Sheikh Muhammad Husayn Fadlallah (Reuter)

Benny Morris

While consistently disavowing that he is Hizbullah's leader, Fadlallah admits to a following within the Hizbullah. But he also has a following in Amal and even among Shi'ites outside Lebanon, and clearly aspires to a role of pan-Shi'ite leadership rather wider than the limits of the Hizbullah.

The unifying theme of that coalition, he says,is the current struggle against Israel. In this battle, Hizbullah is aligned with Shi'ite clerics who are not party members, with Sunni clerics in South Lebanon and Beirut, with Palestinian groups and with Jumblatt's Druse.

THE DAYAN CENTRE's Yossi Olmert surveyed Iranian-Syrian relations, ultimately focusing on the complex web of alliances and maneuvers in Lebanon during the past decade.

Olmert estimates that Iran, despite its severe economic problems, has channelled some $50 million annually to the Lebanese Shi'ites during the past few years. This accounts for the enormous increase in Hizbullah strength, which Olmert puts at 4,000 fighters - 2,500 in the Bekaa, 1,000 in Beirut and 500 in South Lebanon. Moreover, "there has been a gradual movement from small clandestine units to large, semi-regular military formations."

Dealing with the rise of Islamic fundamentalism in the occupied territories, the Centre's Elie Rekhes traced the Iranian influence on the Gazan Islamic Jihad movement.

He said that in the recent disturbances, "Islamic sentiment," had come more and more to the fore. The Iranian revolution "offers Palestinians an authentic Islamic explanation and a perceived solution to both the personal stress of the individual and the collective situation of Palestinian society."

One of the main spiritual guides of the Islamic Jihad in the Strip, he said, is the former kadi of Hebron, Sheikh Rajab al-Tamimi, who was deported in 1980. Tamimi has always stressed that "the Iranian revolution inscribed the word 'Jerusalem' on its flag.

Israel is viewed by the Palestinian Islamic Jihad ideologues as the "spearhead of the satanic forces," bent on expansion from the Nile to the Euphrates. "It is a direct daily threat to Moslems because it sprang up in the heart of the Moslem homeland, on the dead bodies of the Moslem Palestinian people. It is therefore doomed to destruction. 'Israel was born to die.' "

The Palestinian Islamic Jihad identifies the Palestinian problem, said Rekhes, as "an Islamic, not a national problem." Their attitude towards secular Palestinian organizations has been ambiguous, reflecting Khomeini's ambivalence towards the PLO. Initially, the Iranian revolutionaries "stressed their affinity with the PLO." But with the failure of the PLO to conform to Islamic concepts of Palestinian revolution, relations grew distant."

While the Palestinian Islamic fundamentalists (who are overwhelmingly Sunni) look to Iran to assist in forming "the Jerusalem Army" to achieve the liberation of Palestine, there is also an ideological "Jerusalem-Cairo axis." Rekhes believes that the rise of the Moslem fundamentalist underground in the territories in the late 1970s "can be attributed to...the reverberations of the Iranian Revolution; growing despair over the seemingly endless Israeli occupation, and the rejection of the 'corrupt' westernized lifestyle spreading as a result of daily contact with Israeli society."

Regarding Gaza, he said, there were additional catalysts: "the traditionally conservative and strongly religious character of the population; the pressure of social and economic hardships; the impact of the local Al-Azhar branch; and the greater direct influence of Egyptian Islam."

The Church that speaks Aramaic

Charles Hoffman

THE SYRIAN Orthodox Church is one of the oldest, if not the oldest, denomination in Jerusalem, and many centuries ago had one of the largest flocks in the Holy Land. But today it is one of the smallest Christian groups, and its main church is tucked away in an obscure corner of the Old City.

The current Syrian Orthodox archbishop, however, sees this obscurity as richly undeserved. In a recent interview, Archbishop Dionysius Behnam Yacoub Jajjawi chided the authorities, sometimes not so gently, for failing to give his Church its due.

We met in his richly-decorated chambers at St. Marks Church and Monastery, located just off Rehov Habad, between the Jewish and Armenian quarters in the Old City.

"We are the first Christian Church in the world," proclaimed the feisty archbishop, whose jabs at the authorities, and at the press, were softened by a frequent smile or twinkle in his eye. His formal title is "Patriarchal Vicar in the Holy Land and Jordan," a post which he has occupied for almost five years.

"In the house on which this monastery was built lived Mary, mother of John. This place was the first Holy See, where St. James, brother of Jesus, headed the Church. This was also the place of the Upper Room – you know what that is, right? Yes, the site of the Last Supper."

The site of the Last Supper, or rather the one pointed out to most tourists, is usually placed on Mt. Zion. When I mentioned this, the patriarch pardoned me for my ignorance, and launched into a tirade against the Ministry of Tourism.

"I am sorry to say, but the Tourism Ministry does not give proper attention to this place. We did not get proper publicity, and I had to push to get us on the tourism map. But why are people shown Mt. Zion as the site of the Last Supper? That building was not a Christian site at all."

Moderating his stance somewhat, the patriarch stressed that "we do not need the respect for our own benefit. It is for your government's benefit. It is good for propaganda."

He has no complaints, however, about the attitude of the authorities to him personally. "Everyone knows that the Syrian archbishop deserves respect," he said with great satisfaction.

THE ARCHBISHOP was born in 1925 in Mosul, Iraq. He was ordained in 1947 and visited Jerusalem for the first time in 1954. He studied the ecumenical movement at the Union Theological Seminary in New York, a mainline Protestant institution, in the early 1960s. His longest posting, from 1965 to 1980, was at the world headquarters of the Syrian Orthodox Church in Damascus.

The Syrian Orthodox is one of the Monophysite Churches, which stemmed from an early schism in Christianity in 451. They are sometimes known as Jacobites, after one of their early leaders,Jacob Baradeus, but they should not be confused with the Assyrians, or Nestorian Christians. Today, the Syrian Orthodox number about three million.

An ecumenical spirit of sorts was present in our conversation, since the patriarch was eager to point out the linguistic kinship between his Church and the Jews through Aramaic. The Talmud was written in Aramaic, the lingua franca for much of the ancient Near East. It was also the language of daily life for Jesus and his disciples.

The variety of Aramaic used by the Syrian Orthodox is known as Syriac, and is written in an alphabet that differs from both Arabic and Hebrew.

"St. James wrote our first prayers in Aramaic, and today we read the Gospels, pray, and give sermons in this language. There are Syrian Orthodox villages in Turkey where the people still speak Aramaic, and some of them came to Jerusalem during the troubles at the time of the First World War. Some people still speak it here.

"When I talked with the president last week at his reception for Christian leaders, I said to him: 'You say shalom in Hebrew, and we say shalomo in Aramaic. But we need it – meaning peace – here in this land, no matter how we pronounce it.'"

To demonstrate the kinship between Hebrew and Aramaic, Dionysius insisted on reciting the entire alphabet in Aramaic and Hebrew, which indeed sound similar.

THE FLOCK OF the Syrian Orthodox vicar here numbered about 2,500 families before 1948, but many have immigrated to Europe and the U.S. over the years, leaving about 500 families today. Some 400 live in the Bethlehem area, with another 100 scattered around Jerusalem.

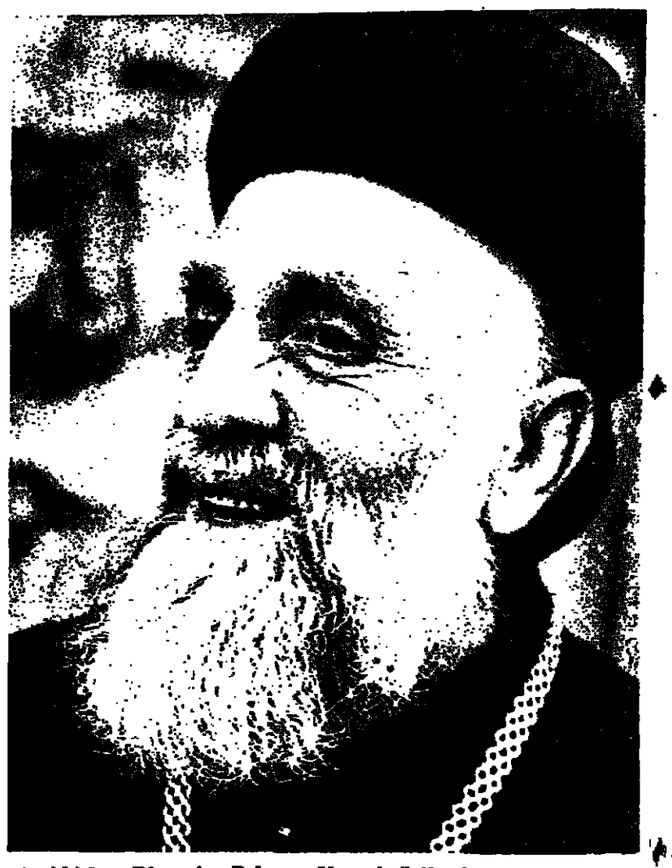

The Israeli authorities, and especially Mayor Teddy Kollek, have encouraged the Church to teach Aramaic to the young generation, as a way to preserve the community's distinctive culture.

"Yes, Teddy gave us help to open a kindergarten, but – it is not nice for me to say this – we had problems in our own community that caused a delay. We still want to do this, but meanwhile our young people learn Aramaic in church."

While it came as no surprise for the patriarch to refer to Jerusalem's mayor as "Teddy," it was interesting to hear him refer to another official as "Shmulik."

The latter turned out to be Shmuel Hamburger, the officer in charge of Christian affairs for the civil administration of Judea and Samaria. But when he spoke of the minister of religious affairs who welcomed him when he first came in 1983, he referred to him as "Dr. Burg."

SHMULIK WAS mentioned in the context of another of the patriarch's complaints, this one against the military authorities. He seems to have adjusted well in this respect to the open society of Israel, since it seems unlikely that he had much practice criticizing the military authorities in the press while he served in Damascus.

Archbishop Dionysius Behnam Yacoub Jajjawi (Artzt / Media)

For many years after the Six Day War, the monasteries of several Churches on the Jordan River near the Allenby Bridge were closed for security reasons, including that of the Syrian Orthodox.

Recently, the IDF has allowed the Greek Orthodox and the Catholics to use their facilities there for ceremonies once a year. The other sites, however, are still unused because they are in an area where access to the river creates greater security problems.

This situation has naturally displeased the patriarch immensely.

"As I told Shmulik, the least the army can do is let us pray in the church there, even if they don't let us go down to the water. How can we celebrate the Epiphany if we can't go to the place of the Epiphany?"

THE SYRIAN ORTHODOX celebrated Christmas yesterday, in accordance with the ancient Julian calendar. They held their Midnight Mass at an altar next to the Grotto, the traditional birthplace of Jesus, in the Basilica of the Nativity in Bethlehem.

This is not a pilgrimage season for the Church, however. Syrian Orthodox pilgrims come at Easter, from Turkey, Europe and the U.S., ranging in number between 80 and 150.

When I ventured that he himself must be the only Iraqi citizen living in Israel,the patriarch laughed. Actually, he has a small coterie of fellow citizens here within his Church – four out of the five priests are from Iraq, while the other is from Turkey.

Continuing in the spirit of ethnic ecumenism, he added: "You have a lot of Iraqis living here." Recalling that he knew Jews in his native Mosul and the surrounding areas, he noted, not without a touch of pride, that "most of the Oriental Jews here come from Iraq."

Upset at Diaspora Jews' threats

Walter Ruby
NEW YORK

THE NEWLY-elected national chairman of the United Jewish Appeal (UJA) appears to be having difficulty making up his mind on several prickly issues likely to loom large when his term begins next May.

Morton Kornreich, president of the UJA-Federation of Greater New York and successor to Martin Stein as national chairman of UJA, said in an interview that he "gets his dander up" at Diaspora Jewish organizations which threaten to cease supporting the UJA-Federation Joint Campaign unless their own favoured projects are more generously funded by the Jewish Agency.

But while making clear his unhappiness that the Reform movement used that method to get the UJA and Jewish Agency to increase funding for Reform institutions in Israel, Kornreich expressed satisfaction that Jewish Agency funding for the Reform and Conservative movements in Israel has been augmented.

Kornreich appeared to take a similarly ambivalent position on the right of Diaspora Jewish leaders to take public positions on Israeli security issues, expressing simultaneous support for the apparently contradictory approaches of Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir.

Addressing the explosive issue of Jewish-Arab relations, Kornreich noted with pride that the New York UJA-Federation has embarked on a new Project Renewal programme to raise living standards in the mixed Jewish-Arab communities of Lod and Ramle.

But Kornreich rejected the suggestion that the UJA and Jewish Agency should spend more on programmes to counter polarization between Arabs and Jews in Israel, arguing that "some of these things may grab the headlines, but are sometimes not the most important things that warrant our attention."

While stating that he does not view the Reform movement's efforts to increase funding for its programmes in Israel as blackmail, Kornreich nevertheless said that the not so subtle threats on the Reform movement's part "concern me ... I always get my dander up at people who threaten...'if you don't do such and such, we will take our money elsewhere'..."

Nevertheless, Kornreich believes that the Reform and Conservative movements are after only "a fair proportion" of funds for their institutions in Israel. He also does not take seriously the charges of some Orthodox leaders that the Reform and Conservative movements are seeking to use Jewish Agency funding to build up their presently miniscule presence in Israel.

NOTING THAT he recently discussed the issue of Diaspora involvement in Israeli political issues with Peres, Kornreich said: "Should we actively and financially support (Israeli) political parties? No. Are we entitled to go over there to reflect our concerns and apprehensions? Why not? We have every right. We have done so on the Who Is a Jew issue..."

Kornreich rejected the inference that he is wavering uneasily between the two Israeli camps on the "Diaspora involvement" issue. "I don't think (Peres and Shamir) take such strenuously different attitudes on input from the Diaspora. Shamir will be as attentive to American concerns, and should be."

Kornreich said that New York UJA-Federation had selected the neighbouring towns of Lod and Ramle as its new Project Renewal project in part because they contain a good sized Arab minority...which has living conditions that are really pitiful. They live in some of the worst slums (in Israel)...a social cancer in the mid-section of Israel ...near the airport."

He said that New York UJA-Federation's selection of Lod-Ramle together with Los Angeles's recent adoption of Jaffa, proves false the assumption that Jewish Agency money is given only to Jews.

Kornreich expressed opposition to the tendency of San Francisco and other communities to contemplate funding their own programmes in Israel, independent of the Jewish Agency, saying: "There is sometimes a kind of unfortunate and debilitating effort of communities...to do their own thing. This is kind of a break up of the unity, and I think it poses a danger because if this were to accelerate, the whole force and effectiveness of UJA [would be threatened]."

But Kornreich confirmed a recent statement by Natan Sharansky that the New York UJA-Federation will commit funds independently of the Jewish Agency to help build low-cost housing for new immigrants in Israel's urban centres. The dearth of low-cost housing outside of remote development towns is a serious problem for Soviet immigrants who have very little money, but wish to live in cities like Jerusalem and Tel Aviv.

Kornreich said that New York UJA-Federation has not yet decided how much money to commit to the project, but pointed out that, "there will not be funds diverted from the Jewish Agency... These are monies that were willed to the UJA without any specific purpose, and I have received permission to use these funds for specific projects selected from a menu of the Jewish Agency. This is not a 'do your own thing' project..."

Kornreich was asked about complaints in the World Zionist Organization that the unelected Diaspora fund raisers had achieved an unwarranted influence in the decision making process of the WZO-Jewish Agency because of the their financial strength. "In a sense we were elected, since the UJA also elects its own delegates to the Zionist Congress. No element has a monopoly on wisdom. It should be a joint effort from all elements of the operation."

World Jewish politicians try to maintain facade of wholehearted support for Israel

Diaspora rumblings

Dvorah Getzler / Knesset Reporter

Lynn Cutler, U.S., and Ivan Lawrence, UK. (Harari)

"The difference between our meetings with Shamir and Peres was like night and day, the one so obdurate, the other so open and reasonable." So, though privately and not for attribution, said an American politician, one of the 20 Jewish parliamentarians from Europe, the Americas and South Africa brought here this week by the Israeli Forum and the Knesset in "the first such gathering in 2,000 years," as participants constantly quipped.

But in public, there was a constant, anxious, almost defensive, stress on "our wholehearted support for Israel," that more than confirmed the same discreet American's comment that "the mafia that runs the powerful Jewish organizations has a fearful stranglehold over Jewish politicians."

But in Europe things are done differently.

The man who broke ranks, with a hard-hitting attack made at a press conference held in the Knesset, was Spanish parliamentarian Enrique Mugica Herzog.

Defending Israel, to which Herzog said he had a lifetime commitment, "does not, cannot mean defending every Israeli government position.

"I have been very concerned at the repression in the territories," Herzog said, as the Likud's MK Ehud Olmert, co-chairing the event, looked glumly at him.

"I feel very uncomfortable that you bring teenagers for trial before military courts. I cannot understand why you have recourse to Mandate government measures to deal with the riots in the territories. Above all, I am disturbed that all this is happening 20 years after the conquest.

"I am impressed at the economic and social strides made in the territories. But what about political rights?

"The present inertia cannot continue," Herzog went on.

For the Spanish deputy, the solution "must be peace," and the granting of self-determination to the Palestinians, which was, he said, "vital. What they do with their future must be their decision. But that right to self-determination must be upheld.

"Otherwise Israel will cease to be a Jewish state; will cease to hold the humanist values we have always associated with Zionism."

Just prior to Herzog's attack, a U.S. congressman had suggested that the coverage given by the media to last month's riots was a tribute to the "undiminished vitality of Israeli democracy."

Riots such as those in the territories, he insisted, happened in all democratic societies. Even the U.S. had had its Kent State University killings. It was all a matter of the media keeping events in perspective. What had impressed him in his meetings with Shamir, Peres and President Herzog, was the determination of all three to achieve peace – "though they may differ in how they want to go about it."

Certainly, the visitors were amazed at the demonstration of disunity given by the national unity government's leaders. They knew, of course, of the polarities of opinion. But seeing and hearing for themselves was a startling experience for them judging by the comments as they emerged from the Peres meeting: "Refreshing. We wish him luck. He's got guts. I hope he pulls it off."

Though the press was rudely ejected from the earlier meeting between the parliamentarians and Shamir, participants spoke freely of Shamir's castigation of the international conference idea. They said that they had told him of their concerns about last month's disturbances and the serious difficulties of explaining Israeli reactions to them. "But we got nowhere with him."

From Peres, they heard a frank acknowledgement of the differences within Israeli society.

The coming election would be perhaps the "most crucial in the history of Israel," because until the people decided, and depending on how they decided, there could be no movement forward towards peace, the foreign minister said.

"Are you likely to get a clear-cut answer from your electorate?" a congressman asked, adding: "We often don't, but that's not so bad. We aren't fighting over moral issues.

When asked whether the U.S. administration could or should be doing more to help Israel achieve peace, Peres replied: "We would like the U.S. not to confuse its objectivity on Israeli politics with neutrality on the peace process.

"We, for our part," he continued, "have to do everything we can politically without paying attention to the riots," though he did say that calm must be restored.

Why does the Foreign Ministry not counter aggressive PLO propaganda, he was asked.

"I do not believe we can answer just by press releases, or issuing declarations. We can only really balance the situation by adopting a policy that demonstrates, in the eyes of the world, that Israel is taking the peace initiative.

The PLO, he said, answering another question, enjoyed the advantage of a flag, in the eyes of the Palestinians. But the Jordanians offered a solution.

If there were to be peace talks, the Palestinians would opt for Jordan. If there were no talks they would throw their weight behind the PLO, with all that that would entail for Israel – including an eventual renewal of the armed conflict.

British Conservative MP Ivan Lawrence QC was not convinced by Peres's reply indicating a limited Russian involvement in the peace process.

Lawrence, a member of the British Parliament's Foreign Affairs Committee and a leading member of his party, is a member of the Board of Deputies, an activist for Soviet Jewry, and has a criminal law practice. He is also a part-time judge.

He disagrees with his party leader Margaret Thatcher's endorsement of the international conference. "It assumes that King Hussein's support for peace cannot be assured in any other way and that that desire can be translated into action. And it also assumes that the Russians are in the mood to help. I think both assumptions are doubtful. I think it is in the Russian interest to have instability in the Middle East," he told The Jerusalem Post, ignoring Peres's words of just an hour earlier.

But an international conference, he felt, might bring some benefit to Soviet Jewry. "If the Russians are prepared to use their Jews as pawns in the international game, they are presumably also prepared to lose them as pawns."

The major difficulty the UK pro-Israel lobby is encountering in coping with last month's riiots in the territories, he says, is "ignorance of the true facts, and newspaper headlines. If you are known to be pro-Israel, you obviously have more difficulty selling the Israeli case if it's unpopular as a result of the media's portrayal.

"I don't feel very entitled to criticize Israel. In the end, the Israelis have to find their own salvation, and back-seat driving doesn't help.

"But I want to see Israel as a jewel in the international eye. I never want to see its name besmirched by any wrong-doing .

"As a Jew I am naturally concerned that the reputation of Jews and the Jewish state is upheld. And as someone concerned with human rights and civil liberties, I want Arabs to have their rights honoured, too. So I don't want a picture – just or unjust – of an oppressive Israel. I feel British Jewry should be proud of Israel. In order to convey that message, it may be helpful if we do have our say.

"Broadly, I feel the government has been right in handling the riots firmly. It would be hypocritical to say otherwise. But it must be humane too. Peace has to involve sacrifice. But the ball is really in the Arab court."

Mel Levine, 44, a third-term Democratic congressman from California, on the Foreign Affairs Committee and the Mid-East Subcommittee, has a life-long involvement in Jewish affairs and says his political outlook was formed by the student unrest of the 1960s.

"It's obvious that we wouldn't be here if we weren't in love with Israel. But at the same time we are worried about Israel's image."

That was broadened by Lynn Cutler, national vice-chairman of the Democratic Party, who spoke of "real divisions in the Jewish community.

"There's growing pain about recent events, it's not monolithic, but it's broad. U.S. Jews are increasingly concerned at the killing, at the methods, at the repression – if that's what it is – about soldiers trying to quell civil disturbances," Cutler said.

Levine, as "a matter of policy" will not be drawn on his personal opinions of recent events. But he will say that "I would like the image of Israel in the U.S. to be more of the peace initiator, the instigator of new and creative ideas. Those are areas where I have worries.

"The reason I say that I worry is that the extent and the nature of the support that Israel receives from the U.S. will have to do with the extent and the nature of the support that Israel has in the U.S. If the image of Israel were to shift, that would have its reflection in the administration.

"While I don't believe the events of the past month have eroded public support, I believe they have considerably shaken it.

"But two calls from highly influential Jews deeply disturbed me. They said that it was my responsibility to try to explain to the Israeli government how deeply disturbing the events of the past month have been.

"People are beginning to ask what type of society this is. If the imagery and the substance do not reflect an Israel that stands for the historic ideals of the state, there will obviously be a fall-out.

"It's my hope that the activities of the last few weeks are an aberration and that the long term causes of these symptoms will be addressed."

For Levine, regarded as a key figure in the delegation, "to the extent that these disturbances recur, Israel will have a problem in the U.S. and it's important for Israel's friends there to tell you this candidly."

People in glass houses...

TELEREVIEW
Philip Gillon

MY HEART bled for Foreign Minister Shimon Peres the other evening, when A New Evening broadcast an excerpt of an interview he gave to journalists on a foreign television station. Naturally, they were harrying him like hounds after a fox as he tried to defend the indefensible, the iron hand used to deal with the chaos that other people had created in the territories.

Peres's policy, understandably, if I may apply to him a paraphrase a famous saying: "My country, even if wrong, must be right." So he came up with a most ingenious concept: Israel was deporting people and doing all kinds of other revolting things because, as an occupying power and under international conventions to which we subscribe, we have to apply harsh Jordanian laws, not gentle Israeli ones. He pointed out virtuously that, although Jordanian law permits it, we have not imposed capital punishment.

His interlocutors looked baffled, like hounds when the fox crosses a brook and they lose the scent. One of them said he was very confused, and asked if Israel did not claim that the territories belong to it. The prime minister must have been infuriated by his foreign minister's reply which implied that it did not.

According to my understanding of international conventions about the behaviour of an occupying power, citing them to justify what we are doing in the territories is an example of the devil quoting Scripture to suit his purpose.

In the Encyclopaedia Britannica's article on Laws of War, it states that international agreements obliged an occupying power subscribing to them "to ensure public order, to maintain 'unless absolutely prevented' the laws in force, and especially to respect the lives and private property of the inhabitants, their family honour and rights, and their religious beliefs and practices...nor was military information to be demanded of the population...

"Much of this text could be summed up as a commandment to preserve the conditions obtaining before occupation. Concessions to the brutal facts of war appeared only by way of exception..."

Of this list of obligations, the only one with which we are trying to comply is ensuring public order. Vast areas of land have been seized and Jewish settlements established in the heart of Arab areas. This is hardly a way to maintain the status quo. The system of torture used by the security forces to obtain military information – a clear violation of the convention, as well as of moral law – has even been excused under certain circumstances by a judicial commission.

Thus any resemblance between what we are doing and our international obligations is purely coincidental, so we should be the last to cite the law. Incidentally, Jordan never controlled Gaza, so I don't know under what law we are expelling Gazans.

I hasten to add that I have nothing but the greatest admiration for Peres, one of the most remarkable men Israel has produced: I am sure that neither his heart nor his mind is behind the iron-hand policy. In fact, he virtually said as much last week on Moked. When I look back at the halcyon years we enjoyed while he was prime minister, and compare them with the dreadful mess created by the present incumbent, I feel like Adam looking back at Paradise Lost. I hope other voters will have noticed the calamities brought down on our poor heads by Prime Minister Shamir and his supporters.

Peres was brilliant and handled his interviewers with consummate ease. But this was not difficult for him, since they only asked him the obvious and well-tried question they have been asking for months. In light of the new situation created by the riots, the obvious question they should have asked was whether the time has not come to talk to any PLO leader prepared to talk to us, as the British came round to talking to Gandhi and to the African leaders who were once outlawed.

ANOTHER ANSWER has now been added to our previous reliance on saying that nothing is really happening in the territories or the Arab towns, that the brutal treatment of Arab women and children is only an illusion created by the media.

Now we say: "People in glass houses shouldn't throw stones. You're all hypocrites, applying double standards of morality. Look at the British in Northern Ireland, the Australian treatment of the aboriginals, the Russian handling of dissidents, above all the Arab treatment of opponents in Syria, Jordan, the West Bank, Iran, Iraq, etc., etc., etc."

We heard President Chaim Herzog taking this line in the extract from his speech to the visiting Jewish parliamentarians, in which he reprimanded British Minister of State David Mellor, and compared our situation to that of the British in Belfast. Mellor took the reference to Northern Ireland in his stride. Replying to the president in an interview on Mabat, he pointed out that the difference between Gaza and Belfast is that all the Northern Irish, including the Catholic minority, have the vote and all other civilian rights, while the Gazans have none. He seems to have a point.

The stereotyped Israeli contention that all the world are hypocrites applying double standards of morality echoes a South African argument.

It brings me no comfort whatsoever. Of course we are judged by different standards from those applied to Khomeini, Assad, Hussein, and all other persecutors everywhere.

I WAS THRILLED to hear, on Mabat Sport, severe criticism of coach Shlomo Sherf for taking out a cigarette and smoking it with evident enjoyment in front of Israel's junior soccer team.

This was the first time I have seen any attack on smoking on Israel Television. It is quite customary to have smokers pull out cigarettes during interviews. A couple of weeks back, on Yaron London's culture programme, he had a long, long talk with a woman apparently intent on committing both murder and suicide. Yaron was slated to be the victim of the murder.

She was a chain-smoker. On the table was an overflowing ashtray filled with revolting, filthy stubs. She was sucking the cancerous poison into her own lungs, then expelling it in a cloud all over Yaron's face.

Perhaps because the news has once again become so depressing, I found several comedies this week to be exceptionally good. Alf and Are You Being Served? were absolute riots. I don't think I have ever seen as funny an episode of the latter as this week's, with Mollie Sugden and John Inman surpassing themselves.

In a different way, Easy Street and Head of the Class were also very funny.

New boss takes over at Jewish Agency and WZO

Simcha Dinitz feels his way

Charles Hoffman

(Karen Benzian)

ONE OF THE first things that a new boss in any large organization does when taking over is to get to know the people who work there. This also applies to Simcha Dinitz, who was elected last month as chairman of the World Zionist Organization, and who will be confirmed next month as chairman of the Jewish Agency.

While most people think of the Agency and WZO as one entity, they are actually two separate but interlinked bodies, each with its own budget, governing bodies and problems. The WZO, which is a political body, deals mainly with Israel-Diaspora relations; while the Agency, which provides services in Israel, is a partnership between the WZO and leaders of Diaspora fund-raising bodies.

Dinitz, 58, was elected as a Labour MK in 1984, and before that spent most of his working life as a diplomat, including 10 years as adviser to Golda Meir and five as Israel's ambassador to the U.S. Before he was elected to his present post in December, at the Zionist Congress, he was familiar with the WZO and Agency only as an outsider.

One of the first things he learned as an insider about this sprawling complex with an annual budget of $500 million, is that it is not a normal organization.

For example, it is not always possible at first glance to tell who does what for whom.

"When people come into my office for their first meeting with me," he said in an interview this week, "they don't wear tags saying that this one works for the Agency, and that one works for the WZO."

During his first few weeks in office, Dinitz also learned that some functionaries work for both organizations, while others are officially attached to one, but do much of their work in the other.

ASIDE FROM getting to know the staff, Dinitz has been mainly occupied with finding ways to move the WZO/Agency in a new direction, in terms of their relations both with Israeli government and society and with the Diaspora.

He is reticent at this stage about his own plans and prescriptions for change. He prefers to wait for the recommendations of three committees that he recently appointed to advise him, as chairman, on possible future directions. The committees are composed of public figures outside the WZO/Agency establishment, with senior WZO/Agency staff serving as observers.

The first committee, headed by former governor of the Bank of Israel Moshe Sanbar, has been charged with finding ways to make the organization and operations of the WZO/Agency more efficient.

The second committee, headed by Yehiel Admoni, will re-examine ita goals and priorities. Admoni served as director-general of two Agency departments, Rural Settlement and Project Renewal.

The third committee, Dinitz said, "will deal with ideological issues. These include Israel-Diaspora relations, and the nature of the message the Zionist movement should transmit to the Jewish world. No less important for this committee will be something that has been neglected for a long time – the meaning of Zionism for Israelis."

He has not chosen a chairman for this third committee yet, but wants "an intellectual who has not been closely associated with the Zionist establishment, one who can bring a fresh approach and perspective" to the task.

Dinitz hopes to push things forward at a faster pace than has been habitual in the the past.

"I want to have interim reports from the first two committees by next month. After they report to me, I will bring their recommendations before the WZO Executive, and what pertains to the Agency proper will be discussed at its board of governors meeting in mid-February.

"While long-term changes in organization and priorities are important, we should not overlook what can be done in the short term. For example, we have begun to reduce duplication by eliminating offices in Tel Aviv for certain units. I closed the chairman's office there, and Uzi Narkiss, head of the Information Department, has followed suit.

"As soon as I took over, I imposed a freeze in the WZO on new contracts, appointments, missions abroad and even requests by staff for extra kilometrage. I have asked Agency director-general Shlomo Gazit to apply the same to the Agency."

IT IS important to Dinitz that the WZO side of the partnership regain the initiative in dealing with Agency problems. In the last years of Arye Dulzin's term as chairman, practically all criticism of the Agency and initiatives for change came from community leaders and fund-raisers in the Diaspora.

"I don't see our Diaspora partners in the Agency as rivals. But one side should not be treated as inferior to the other. Their criticism of how the WZO side operates, however, has been partly our fault, because we have allowed things to deteriorate.

"Actually, there are plenty of problems on their side too," Dinitz stressed, referring to the American fund-raising and community bodies. "They are far from being a 'kingdom of priests.' But they keep their problems inside, while ours are displayed in public."

Dinitz's concern for refurbishing the status of the WZO also relates to the negotiations for distributing the portfolios on the WZO and Agency executives. These talks sometimes drag on for months, but he wants to be able to present the WZO's candi*dates for the Agency departments* for approval at the forthcoming board of governors meeting.

"We have to show results. We can't let them say that the Zionists aren't able to present good candidates. Perhaps the system of selecting candidates from the WZO should be changed, so that the parties can pick from a bigger reservoir."

CONCERNING THE roles and format of the Zionist Congress, Dinitz is clear on the need for a complete overhaul.

"This past Congress was not a pleasant experience. I can't even tell you for sure how many resolutions were passed. Was it 250? 350? Anyway, there were hundreds, and there was not even a resolutions committee to keep them down to reasonable proportions or to sort out those that overlapped or contradicted each other.

"When Moses came down from Mt. Sinai, he had only 10 'resolutions' with him. That was enough for the Jewish people. We have to reform and rethink the entire Congress, which was once the summit of political participation for the Jewish people. Now that there is a state, the Congress does not have to have the same meaning that it did 40 years ago.

"It is not necessary at each Congress to open up all the ideological issues that have been occupying the Jewish people for the past 2,000 years. We can't be constantly debating about who is a Jew, or what the borders of the State of Israel should be. The job of the Congress should be to discuss practical policies and to create the motivation to get on with the practical work."

The next Congress, Dinitz told the WZO executive earlier this week, should be completely different from the last.

Exposing defence data for public debate

David Krivine

ISRAEL HAS THREE vital subjects to tackle: the Diaspora, the trade deficit – and the war with the Arabs. The first two, both civilian topics, are studied and discussed by all the country's learned institutions. The third is the exclusive possession of the defence establishment – or was, until the Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies came into existence.

The defence of Israel, which consumes almost one-third of the state budget and accounts for almost one-third of the national income, is not fully exposed to public debate as are other issues, owing to security considerations.

Aharon Yariv knows all about security, having been head of Military Intelligence; and he believed, when he retired from the army, that public debate is desirable. To achieve that, an organization was needed, which should be completely independent.

It should at the same time evoke the trust of the Defence Ministry and the armed forces (which administer the occupied territories) sufficiently to be granted access to all information that is not strictly classified.

Finally, it should subject this information to broad scrutiny by trained minds – people other than the uniformed brass-hats – including experts in economics, geopolitics, public administration and international affairs.

THE JCSS HAS been doing that for the last 10 years. Says Yariv: "If you ask whether we have conjured up a solution to the Arab-Jewish conflict, bringing salvation to all, the answer is no, we haven't."

What the centre does is throw light on knotty problems, and that is important. People cannot think unless they are apprised of the facts. The centre gets the facts together – including material from disciplines other than the purely military. It analyses those facts and weighs up possible conclusions.

For example, cabinet minister Arik Sharon claimed, following on an incursion in the north, that there had been a rise in terrorism. Knesset member Ran Cohen took issue with him, citing JCSS statistics to indicate that, on the contrary, there had been a decline.

His institution publishes a yearbook, called InTer: A Review of International Terrorism, which is quoted worldwide, being translated even into Japanese. (It lists 800-900 terrorist organizations.) Another JCSS yearbook is The Middle East Military Balance. This volume contains among other things details of the arms possessed by every state in the Middle East, including Israel. The Balance, as it is called for short, is extensively used, figuring in testimony in the U.S. Congress. It has been published in pirated Arabic translations.

Does the centre hold a political view, whether hawkish or dovish?

No, it does not officially adopt any particular stand, says Yariv. Most of its writers, he admits, reach conclusions that may be described as dovish, but "in order to stay on an even keel, we sometimes commission work from writers known to be hawks." Most recent of them is former MK Yehuda Ben-Meir of the National Religious Party, who made a detailed examination of decision-making on security matters in the Israel cabinet.

THE CENTRE HAS also produced 10 books, eight studies, papers and 19 memoranda. That is in addition to its many conferences and seminars, some of them held jointly with distinguished foreign bodies such as Georgetown University and the Rand Corporation.

Yariv decided at the very beginning what sum was needed to finance the centre and went to get it.

"My aim was to build up an endowment of $3 million. This would provide a yearly income to pay for the centre and its activities. I managed initially to raise $700,000, borrowed the remaining $2.3m., and was in business."

He did not stop at that, managing in the course of time to mobilize almost 200 contributors, notably Malvin Jaffee of Southern California, after whom the Centre is named. The endowment fund has now reached $6m. after repaying the $2.3m. loan and interest.

The centre's income is supplemented by matching funds from Israel's Higher Education Council.

Accommodation is supplied by Tel Aviv University, sponsor and patron of the centre, at a rent of $100,000 a year. But now JCSS's status justifies acquiring quarters of its own. A suitable building would cost $1.5m.; and sure enough, Arele (as Yariv is usually known in Israel) has managed to find a donor.

Question: "Aluf Yariv, you are reported to have made a statement last week suggesting that you favour a transfer of the Arab population out of the country if agreement can be reached with their representatives on the subject."

Answer: "What I said was that the talk prevalent among some extremists about population transfer is meaningless. The exit of Arabs would only be possible, I stressed, if the other side agreed, and there is no chance whatever that they will.

"I bite my tongue for having addressed myself to this absurd subject. My point was that all discussion of it is a waste of the national energy because population movements of that kind do not even figure in the scale of possibilities."

Moreover, he knows how to make his revenue go a long way. He has an arrangement for publication with The Jerusalem Post, which prints the centre's material at its own expense and sells it. Another distributor is the Westview Press of Boulder, Colorado, which specializes in supplying America's academic institutions.

According to a JCSS handout, "There are very few publishers anywhere who accept works they have not read. Westview and The Post were actually prepared to agree in advance, sight unseen, to advertise and publish the research that JCSS promised to carry out."

THE CENTRE HAS dealt (apart from terrorism) with four main subjects: the Palestinians, the occupied territories, autonomy, and relations with the U.S. What, for instance, are the pros and cons of a Palestinian state (which our present government will not consider)? Mark Heller has produced an enlightening book on the subject.

What can be learnt from the experience of past military occupations? Uri Bialer, perusing the history of the stationing of armed forces in foreign territories, reveals that they are generally short-lived.

What frontiers should we settle for in a peace agreement with the Arabs? Saul Cohen, president emeritus of Queens College in New York, suggests an answer in The Geopolitics of Israel's Border Question.

Can we go ahead with Arab autonomy? Arye Shalev considers the proposal that Israel set up unilaterally an autonomous regime in Judea and Samaria. He says a negotiated settlement would be better.

Can we get away with a Greater Israel policy? Nimrod Novik's book, The United States and Israel, warns that if Israel refuses to be flexible over territory, domestic determinants inside America are likely in time to cause a toughening of Washington's stance on the subject.

What of Israel's nuclear deterrent? Shai Feldman recommends a public announcement that we have it and will use it if compelled to. This would permit us to withdraw to borders that might be deemed vulnerable if defended with conventional weapons alone.

ISRAEL HAS HAD to cut its military budget lately, causing perplexity over what to do about defence needs. The JCSS ran a four-day conference on the subject and the proceedings were published in book form.

Five conferences were held on Lebanon. In 1983, at the initiative of Moshe Arens, then defence minister, the centre participated in a war game on the alternatives of redeployment and withdrawal in Lebanon.

These are some of the topics covered so far, and the think-tank activities continue. A book by Shalev is due to come out on the strategic importance of the Golan Heights. The Gulf War may be approaching its conclusion and two conferences are scheduled on that during 1988.

The JCSS rarely deals with technical subjects that are under the direct purview of the armed forces. It published a memorandum on naval doctrine which caused a reassessment of the Saar-5 missile-boat project. (The memorandum suggests that the desired objectives could be attained more economically by revamping the Saar-4.)

But generally, the centre focuses on strategic topics that concern the army only partially, being of interest also to the political echelon (e.g., peace-making with the Arabs) and foreign-affairs specialists (e.g., relations with the U.S.). It is this overlap that may have done most to reconcile the army to the organization's existence. In fact, the military now participate willingly in the JCSS's seminars and other activities. The ice has been broken between soldier and civilian. Arele Yariv was uniquely equipped to make the match.

The dangers of 'patriotic' handling of news

Moshe Negbi

MANY OF our political leaders have accused the media of acting irresponsibly in their coverage of the violent incidents in the occupied territories. Such remarks reveal a common misconception about the role of the press in modern society. To my mind, both the foreign and Israeli media have fulfilled their roles magnificently in the occupied territories.

The true responsibility of the press is to give the public all the information it needs in order to shape its opinion about the government in power. Without such information, the whole notion of democratic elections becomes meaningless. How can the voter determine if his leaders deserve to remain in power, or if their policies are valid, if he isn't aware of their actions and the consequences of their policies. This is especially important in the case of the occupied territories, about which there is much bitter controversy concerning Israeli policy, the desirability of our military presence there, and the terrible moral price involved in that presence. The availability of comprehensive, uncensored information about recent events there is essential if the Israeli electorate is to make an intelligent decision about its position on this crucial issue.

While many politicans have grave misconceptions about the role of a free press in a democratic society, this attitude also prevails in the Israeli media. Too many people in both the printed and electronic media accept the politicians' argument that the press should restrain itself and suppress crucial information whenever the government tells it publication would damage the national interest.

Because of this faulty attitude, not only do we have military censorship in Israel, but also a self-imposed censorship of non-military matters, a voluntary system which is enforced by the Editors' Committee – a body comprising most of our daily press. This committee agrees frequently to government requests to withhold publication of information, even when the military censor permits publication. This is usualy done on the grounds of "national interest," i.e. a cabinet member or a senior official claims it is in the national interest to withhold certain information from the public.

When the Editors' Committee accepts such an argument, and imposes self-censorship, it does so on patriotic grounds: it believes sincerely that it is protecting our national interest. However, here again there is a misconception: in a democratic society the basic assumption is that the national interest itself is open to debate, and it may well be that the government's view of the national interest is mistaken or distorted. Whenever editors automatically accept the government's subjective view of the national interest, and consequently suppress information, they are acting irresponsibly by depriving the public of information essential for democratic decision-making.

THE DANGERS of such journalistic acquiescence, in the guise of patriotic responsibility, were witnessed in the Yom Kippur War. A week before war broke out, all Israeli media had information about enemy troop concentrations along the cease-fire lines. Since this information was freely published abroad, the military censor had no plausible reason to censor it, and he allowed publication.

However, the IDF's chief of general staff asked the Editors' Committee to impose voluntary self-censorship. He said that publication would cause panic which may, in turn, force the government to mobilize reserve units at great expense. This was, in the government's view, damaging to the national interest because, according to its intelligence reports, there was no real danger of war. The editors accepted the request and nothing was published until it was too late.

In the case of the 1973 war the government made a genuine mistake about the national interest. However, the media have to be aware that government officials or politicians sometimes lie intentionally about the national interest. The General Security Services affair is a striking example. For weeks the prime minister, the deputy prime minister and the head of the GSS himself claimed that the national interest made it necessary to cover up this affair, not to investigate it and to suppress most of the information about it. These claims were completely refuted by the Supreme Court's judgment and the attorney-general's report on the affair. We now know that the reason for the government's quest for secrecy was not the national interest, but rather the personal interest of senior GSS officers to cover up their illegalities.

The lessons to be drawn from these examples are clear – the media are not qualified and indeed have no right to determine what the national interest is, and whether that interest justifies suppression of information. When the Editors' Committee, or an editor or reporter, withholds information which the military censor allowed for publication, and professes to decide "what is good for the citizen to know," it betrays both the public's trust and its own professional duty.

There are only two questions a reporter or editor may ask himself before publication: Is the information true? Will it help the reader (or viewer) to pass judgment on the government and its policies? If the answer to both questions is positive there is absolutely no justification for self-restraint or self-censorship.

When senior politicians call for more restrained, more responsible media coverage in the occupied territories or elsewhere, what they actually mean is that the press should act in the irresponsible fashion it did on the eve of the Yom Kippur War, and betray its democratic function. As a journalist and as a constitutional lawyer I do hope that the media – both here and abroad – do not heed such calls and keep on giving the public all the relevant facts and pictures about the troubled and troubling situation in the occupied territories.

Israel today -- unique or normal?

Jacob Chinitz

IN THESE DAYS when the character of Israel is in question again, it may not be in style to turn to Herzl. After all, 90 years have passed, there is Jewish state and much water has run under the bridge. On the other hand, Herzl's picture does hang in the Knesset, and he has not yet been "revised" out of Israeli history.

I believe his little book The Jewish State, which started it all, can shed some light on the inner conflict that has always dominated the Zionist venture. I refer to the conflict between the deep yearning for normalcy that is at the core of Zionist ideology and the equally deeply entrenched yearning for excellence in that same ideology.

We should not think that the moral challenge emanates only from a variety of external sources: Margaret Thatcher, who tells us to behave like Jews; the U.S. State Department, which tells us to obey international law; the artists among us who, either out of artistic chic or sincere sensitivity, show Israeli soldiers shooting pregnant women; American Reform rabbis preaching the prophetic message to us; or our own Orthodox rabbis pointing to the dangers of godless nationalism.

The challenge comes from that half of the schizophrenic Zionist psyche that is found in Herzl's old pamphlet, along with his exhortations for normalcy that constitute the other half of that same psyche.

We quote:

"Universal brotherhood is not even a beautiful dream. Antagonism is essential to man's greatest efforts.

"The Jewish State... will require... a professional army, equipped with every requisite of modern warfare, to preserve order internally and externally.

"We shall prevent any theocratic tendencies from coming to the fore on the part of our priesthood. We shall keep our priests within the confines of their temples in the same way as we shall keep our professional army within the confines of their barracks."

In other words, Herzl was thinking of a typical 19th-century modern, liberal, democratic state with religion separated from state, with army separated from state but definitely there to use force against internal and external foes.

We quote again:

"But the Jews, once settled in their own State, would probably have no more enemies.

"The world will be freed by our liberty, enriched by our wealth, magnified by our greatness.

"Whatever we attempt to accomplish for our own welfare will react powerfully and beneficially for the good of humanity."

In other words, Herzl was also thinking of something ideal. A state without enemies. The world magnified by Jewish greatness, some kind of secular version of the Kaddish: Magnified...be the name of the Almighty....The Jewish state would have to think of the good of humanity.

HERZL WAS sensitive to the accusation of utopianism. Already in his preface he warns his critics not to misunderstand his thesis.

"I must guard my scheme from being treated as Utopian by superficial critics who might commit this error...this Utopia is far less attractive than any one of those portrayed by Sir Thomas More."

For Herzl, the Jewish state does not have to be perfect, but it has to be better. "We shall not revert to a lower stage, we shall rise to a higher one. We shall not dwell in mud huts: we shall build new, more beautiful and more modern houses....We shall surrender our well-earned rights only for better ones." Just to have a state is not enough. It must be better.

Not only must the Jews benefit from a Jewish state, but the gentiles too must benefit from Zionism. "The countries they abandon will revive to a new period of prosperity. There will be an inner migration of Christian citizens into the positions evacuated by Jews."

Herzl sees the abnormality of life in exile as itself the normal result of circumstances. If he entertains notions of excellence for the Jewish state, he has no such illusions for Jews without a state. "The oppression we endure does not improve us, for we are not a whit better than ordinary people. It is true that we do not love our enemies...oppression naturally creates hostility against oppressors....It is impossible to escape from this eternal circle."

Presumably only the normalcy of a state can rectify the situation. What would Herzl say about the circle of hostility between Israel and its Arab neighbours, and now we see, its Arabs within?

HERZL, obsessed as he is with the unique abnormality of the Jewish people among all other peoples, expects the state to be unique – normal but unique. "Distress binds us together, and, thus united, we suddenly discover our strengh. Yes, we are strong enough to form a state, and, indeed a model state."

So, was it Nehye kikol hagoyim, let us be like all the other nations – or was it Or lagoyim, A Light Unto the Nations, for Herzl? It seems to have been both. This complex, with him and with us, complicates our national and international relations no end.

A people to be reckoned with

TORA TODAY / Pinchas H.Peli

The Tora portion this week is Shemot (Exodus 1:1-6:1)

"NOW THERE arose a new king over Egypt, who knew not Joseph" (Exodus 1:8). Tora does not cite the name of the new king, just as it did not tell us the name of his predecessor.

As far as the biblical story is concerned, the Egyptian kings whom Israel had encountered were just "Pharaoh," which is not a proper name, but means simply "the big house." It is there that the king resided and it was from there that the Israelites in their struggle for freedom would have to break away.

Redemption, we learn, is not achieved as long as the total dependency of Israel on the "Big (White?) House" persists, whether or not it may be inhabited at the moment by a chief executive who is well disposed towards them. Such dependency is bound to be a risky affair. One day Joseph is a "big wheel" in the government, second in power only to the king himself; the next day, "there arose a new king, who knew not Joseph."

How "new" could he have been? Many of the classical Tora commentators are puzzled: Was it possible to forget so soon that great revolutionary leader who actually saved Egypt from shame and starvation? How could they so completely blot out from their memory the young foreigner whom they all had admired and cheered in the streets?

To prove that it is indeed possible for certain regimes to revise and bluntly re-write history in spite of all known facts, some talmudic rabbis (TB Sotah 11a; also quoted by Rashi, ad. loc.) claim that in fact this "new" king was not new at all. He was the same king who one fine day decided to reverse his policy. The new era required that Joseph and all that he had accomplished for the sake of Egypt be conveniently ignored and completely blotted out.

We in our own time can well perceive this kind of sudden change of mind and policy. It was difficult, however, for the famous Renaissance Tora commentator R' Ovadia Sforno (Italy, 1475-1550) to grasp. He therefore suggested that the new Pharaoh surely found Joseph's name inscribed in the national records of Egypt. Yet "he knew not Joseph," meaning, that he did not know of Joseph's connection with the Hebrews.

Most other commentators stress the fact that the behaviour of this new Pharaoh proves beyond any doubt that "he knew not," not out of ignorance or some inexplicable lack of information, but because he did not wish to know. "Not knowing" was a calculated element in his policy of tyranny.

Later on, when Moses and Aaron confront him with the Almighty's demand: "Let my people go!", he says: "Who is the Lord, that I should harken unto his voice to let Israel go? I know not the Lord, and moreover, I will not let Israel go!" (ibid., 5:1-2).

"He knew not Joseph," he knows not the Lord. He pretends to be a "know not" only because he is convinced that he really knows everything and is above everyone. He believes in his highly sophisticated technology and his "dealing wisely" (1:10) with all kinds of threats to his power which makes him decide at one point to annihilate the clan of Joseph whom he conveniently prefers to "know not."

Pharaoh was probably the first one to realize that the family of Joseph was emerging as a people to be reckoned with. No one before him, including the Israelites themselves, had referred to Israel as "a people" (1:9). Pharaoh was the first to know that, but was determined to "know not" and to deprive them of their peoplehood even before they themselves became aware of it.

WITH ALL THIS sophisticated diplomacy of "wise dealings," the plan that Pharaoh devises is gross: have all Israelite male children killed at birth. Two midwives refuse to serve as the king's secret agents to implement his evil design.

When summoned by Pharaoh to explain why they disobeyed the king's orders the midwives produce an alibi: "Because the Hebrew women are not like the Egyptian women; they are vigorous: before the midwife can even get to them, they have given birth..." Tora however points out the true motivation of these brave women: "And because the midwives feared God, he made them houses" (1:21).

This is explained as being related to how the midwives were rewarded for not harming the male babies. "He [God] made them houses," is interpreted by the rabbis (TB Sotah 11b, quoted in Rashi) to mean that they became the founders of dynasties (or "houses") of priests and kings.

There is another interesting reading of the above verse: "And because the midwives feared God [and did not follow Pharaoh's orders], he [Pharaoh] made them houses." Says Rashbam (R' Shmuel b. Meir, grandson of Rashi): Pharaoh decreed that the midwives could not make home calls anymore and that all babies would henceforth be delivered only in special "houses," i.e., state controlled maternity hospitals. Thus, all deliveries of the Israelite babies would be under the watchful eye of the "big brother" supervising them from his headquarters in the "big house."

This too did not help further Pharaoh's evil designs until he involved "all his people," ordering (1:2) that "every son that is born ye shall cast into the river." Unlike the previous secret order to the midwives, this order does not mention the Israelites by name.

On the face of it, this was a general rule which applied equally to all citizens, but everyone knew against whom it was really directed. Pharaoh, who claimed so often to be an innocent "know not," knew very well just what he was doing, turning his entire people into executioners and informers, causing a total demoralization of the populace, inciting and directing a mass psychosis of hatred against a defenceless minority, the Israelites. And this time it worked.

Pharaoh, to be sure, did not act all on his own. He had convened a mini-international Security Council to consult with and eventually approve of his action. The council consisted, according to an interesting talmudic tradition (TB Sotah 11b) of three well-known non-Israelite biblical figures: Balaam, Job and Jethro. When Pharaoh laid out before them his plans for the "final solution" of the Israelite problem, Balaam gave it his enthusiastic approval. Later he had to pay dearly for this and was killed. Job kept his silence. Later, suffering was inflicted upon him, because he allowed others to suffer and did nothing to stop Pharaoh's diabolic plans. Jethro, who was now left with an effective minority vote, fled. He was rewarded by having his daughter marry Moses and seeing his descendants serving as members of the Sanhedrin. Even though Jethro did nothing to concretely change the situation, his fleeing in protest is remembered and rewarded.

WHEN MOSES, who grew up in the Big House, first "goes out" to view the labour camps, he is confronted with this mess of demoralized, degraded people, both among the oppressors and the oppressed. Yet, he did not treat both oppressor and victim by the same scale of values as many "objective" outside observers would, but immediately identified with his suffering brethren.

When he saw "an Egyptian man smiting a Hebrew man," he even resorted to a most drastic measure: "He turned this way and that, seeing no one about, he struck down the Egyptian and hid him in the sand" (2:12). He looked about and saw that there was no one else to strike back at the oppressor, that they were all paralysed, as if waiting passively for the next blow to come down on their heads.

Vayar ki ein ish, "and he saw that there was no person there," meaning that they had all lost their dignified personalities and were now but helpless slaves, listless skeletons of their former selves. It was at that moment that Moses decided to act. Did he do it in order to shake them out of the perpetual cycle of slavery in which they were caught and remind them that free humans must fight for their lives (as suggested by Andre Neher in his work on Moses)? This act still stands out as a strange beginning for the career of one who was destined to pronounce in the ears of the entire world the commandment "Thou shall not murder!"

Imagine what this act did to the "image" of Moses after it was "exposed" by one of his own people (2:14). What headlines it must have made in the media around the world. The same media that hardly mentioned the thousands of Israelite children who were kidnapped and murdered, the hundreds of thousands who were enslaved and tortured, were sure to give front-page coverage to the startling story of Moses killing one Egyptian.

Even within the camp of Israel the story was not taken lightly. Numerous explanations were offered by the rabbis through the generations to describe the dilemma in which Moses found himself at that crucial moment. Those range from looking at Moses' act as killing in self-defence, to having the slain Egyptian brought first to trial before a heavenly tribunal of angels with Moses being the one to carry out the death sentence which this man legally deserved after "smiting" (killing) another man whose sole crime was that he was "a Hebrew." There are also sources which actually condemn Moses for this action.

All agree that it was not a "nice" act and it was certainly not a pleasant task for Moses to have to commit, neither is it pleasant for many of us to read about it today. Notwithstanding all this, it was not taken out of the Tora which tells us the story about the hazardous road of the people of Israel to freedom.

Non-stop calls for assistance

SOME OF OUR contributors have apologized for getting their cheques in after Hanukka. We cannot emphasize strongly enough that it doesn't make any difference when donations for the Toy Fund are sent, since we are in constant need of funds all year round, not only during Hanukka.

The Fund is being inundated with requests for help in furnishing new centres for underprivileged children. They are in urgent need of toys, libraries, learning aids and special equipment for teaching both children and parents. Without your donations coming throughout the year, we will not be able to give them even minimal help. Don't let the flow of contributions dry up.

Some very impressive contributions were received this week, including cheques for NIS 1,900 for each fund raised by the Israel Bowls Association on its annual Max Spitz Charity Day. Elisheva Stern from Kibbutz Maoz Haim augmented each fund with a contribution of NIS 1,000. From abroad, Elie and Jacqueline Sasson of Lausanne, Switzerland, honoured the memory of their fathers by sending two cheques for $500 each, and Craig and Kathy Bell of Muttontown, NY, honoured their son Jeffrey with a contribution of $500 to the Toy Fund. An anonymous contributor remembered three family members with three contributions of $360 each (20 times hai). Ilan and Amit Ron from Ramat Hasharon sent NIS 50 for the Toy Fund in memory of their little brother Eyal "who loved Hanukka," and Erwin Laufer of Haifa chose to thank Mr. M. Shitreet and Mrs. A. Ilan, members of the Israel Embassy staff in Cairo, for help extended, by donating NIS 50.

It's not the size of the contribution that counts, but the thought behind it. All the contributions added together help us to care for those in need. Don't hesitate. Send your cheques today (separate ones for each fund) to: The Jerusalem Post Funds, P.O.B. 81, 91000 Jerusalem.

EUROPEAN CUP BASKETBALL: Mac. TA 108, Saturn Cologne 102

Maccabi's watch on the Rhine

By YORAM KESSEL and DON GOULD

An impressive outside display by Maccabi Tel Aviv's formidable array of shooters in a game of gung-ho sharpshooters enabled the Israeli champions to climb over West Germany's Saturn and record a fine 106-100 victory in Cologne last night.

The Germans were forced to play without their superstar Michael Jackel; but even so they had a distinct height advantage. Recognizing this fact, Ralph Klein took a gamble by playing with three small men virtually throughout and concentrated on his outside scoring power.

It was a gamble which paid off handsomely in a game, which, although sometimes hard-fought, often resembled a training session in the way players from both teams peppered the baskets from a every conceivable angle and often from remarkable depth. Maccabi had five three-pointers in the first half and four in the second, compared to Cologne's 4-4. The extremely high shooting percentages (both teams well over 60%) reflects the fact that neither team tried any sort of coherent defence whatsover.

Still, shooting can be an attractive pastime and when Maccabi come out so well on top in an away game who is to quarrel with such risky tactics. Maccabi were away to a racing start with Mickey Berkowitz cracking in nine almost instantaneous points. Thereafter there was a fine even spread of points as Maccabi's main task was to contain the splendid Cologne import, Ralph McPherson (spurned by Hapoel Haifa before the start of the season), who popped in the half high 21 points.

Maccabi were keeping their noses in front at the half (50-46) and then sprinted away into what seemed like an irreversible lead early in the second half, with Doron Jamchee and Ken Barlow now taking up the cudgels. Midway through the second half Maccabi had cantered to a 13 point lead, 84-71.Chen Lipin as playmaker was a dynamo.

To their dismay Maccabi found the former Dallas Mavericks player Bryan Warwick ptiting up a great fight when all seemed lost for his team. He whipped in 26 second-half points, and suddenly there were fears that this would be another losing cliffhanger of the type in which Maccabi have specialized all season.

The Tel Aviv lead was whittled down to just one point at 95-94, climbed back to three, and then the marvel Berkowitz in one of his customary cheeky actions poked the ball from under a Cologne arm as they were preparing to mount what could have been a critical offensive move. After that Maccabi never looked back.

To advance to the finals of the European Cup it is essential to manage at least one or two away triumphs and last night's win consolidates Maccabi in third place.

HIGH SCORERS: Maccabi – Jamchee 30, Barlow 21, Magee 20, Berkowitz 18. Saturn – McPherson 36, Warwick 32.

In the other final pools games of the round champions Tracer Milano also scored a valuable away win, 88-78 against Orthez. The other two games went with home court advantage, Barcelona registering their first win of the competition 115-90 over Den Bosch and Partisan holding Aris in Belgrade 102-94.

This leaves the final pool standing as follows:

After 5 rounds

	W	L	F	A	Pts.
1. Tracer	4	1	446	448	9
2. Partisan	4	1	468	454	9
3. Maccabi	3	2	504	500	8
4. Aris	3	2	473	471	8
5. Den Bosch	2	3	475	502	7
6. Cologne	2	3	501	494	7
7. Barcelona	1	4	492	478	6
8. Orthez	1	4	445	457	6

Bates, wind give Amos a fright

AUCKLAND (Reuter) – After going down in the first set, Amos Mansdorf of Israel had to survive a second set tiebreaker, before coming through 4-6, 7-6(7-3), 6-1 against unseeded Briton Jeremy Bates, 25, ranked 87 in the world, in the second round of the $93,400 Benson and Hedges Grand Prix here.

Mansdorf said that the high winds caused problems with his service.

"I had to force myself to think that I was serving as if there was no wind and as if I was serving indoors," he explained.

Mansdorf now plays Dan Goldie of the U.S. in the quarter-finals. Goldie defeated fellow-American Marty Davis 5-7, 6-4, 6-1 in his second-round match. Goldie, 24, 1.88 metres tall, is expected to be a tough opponent. He is urrently 50 on the ATP computer, and his strong serve-and-volley game will be a true test for the Israeli champion.

American qualifier Todd Witsken came close to ousting top seed Peter Lundgren of Sweden. But the Swede battled through the windy conditions to win 6-3, 6-7(4-7), 6-3 and to book a place in the quarter-finals against Indian Ramesh Krishan.

Witsken, a former U.S. junior Davis Cup team member, twice held break points in the third set before Lundgren recovered with a vital service break.

Krishnan had the easiest path to the last eight with a 7-5, 6-3 win over seventh seed Michiel Schapers of the Netherlands.

Chesnokov sprints to victory

SYDNEY (Reuter) – Soviet tennis star Andrei Chesnokov sprinted from his hotel room into the semi-finals of the New South Wales Open yesterday. The Russian, thinking his quarter-final match with Darren Cahill was still some way off, was lying on his bed in a hotel a mile from the White City stadium, when he looked at his television set and saw his Australian opponent about to step out on centre court.

Grabbing his bag and rackets, the No. 3 seed raced downhill across six lanes of freeway, through a garage forecourt and over a park in a creditable six minutes – and still had enough breath left to beat Cahill 6-3, 7-5.

Chesnokov, the first Russian to reach the last four in Sydney since Alex Metreveli won the tournament in 1972, was pleased with his performance against Cahill, but slightly disappointed with his street time.

"If it hadn't been for some joggers and the traffic, I reckon I could have done it in five," he said later.

Alexander Volkov almost made it an all-Russian semi-final when he recovered from losing the first set 6-0 to take number one seed Christo van Rensburg all the way before losing 6-0, 4-6, 7-5 to the South African. In the women's competition, top-seeded Pam Shriver learnt her lesson from a close shave against Britain's Sara Gomer yesterday by not letting West Germany's Wiltrud Probst have a sniff of a chance in the boiling sun. The American won 6-1, 6-2. No. 3 seed Claudia Kohde-Kilsch was almost as impressive in her straight-sets victory over Czechoslovak Jana Novotna, beaten by Shriver in the Brisbane final last weekend.

CRICKET

Last ball decides two games

AHMEDABAD, India (AP) – West Indies scored a narrow two-run victory over India in the fifth one-day cricket international yesterday after a nail-biting finish that saw Indian tailenders struggling to make runs.

The visitors now are leading 4-1 in the eight match series. The match in this western Indian city was plagued by a controversy about whether it was an official or a friendly encounter.

Indian Skipper Ravi Shastri insisted that it was not, but Indian cricket officials declared it was an official match. West Indian players declined to comment.

India restricted the Windies to 196 all out in 48.1 overs. Sanjeev Sharma and Chetan Sharma, India's last-wicket pair needed to make three runs off the last ball available to them but failed to score.

SCORES: WI 196 ao, India 194/9 (50 overs).

In Melbourne, Australia won an equally thrilling game against New Zealand, winning by just six runs.

Australia slumped to 39 for four, but Steve Waugh (68) enabled them to reach 216 all out. Waugh also captured the wicket of Richard Hadlee with eight needed off the final two deliveries. New Zealand finished on 210 for nine.

SCORES: Australia 216, NZ 210/9 (50 overs).

NHL – Wednesday's games: Detroit 4, St. Louis 2; Edmonton 5, Hartford 1; (OT) Toronto 5, Minnesota 5; NY Rangers 4, Vancouver 2; Buffalo 6, Montreal 5; Quebec 6, Chicago 1; Calgary 6, Winnipeg 1.

NBA – Wednesday's games: Boston 117, New York 108; Philadelphia 116, Utah 93; Detroit 90, Atlanta 87; Cleveland 116, LA 100; Denver 98, New Jersey 93; LA Lakers 103, Dallas 89; Seattle 110, Houston 95.

SOCCER PREVIEW

Great games – even apart from Toto

By YORAM KESSEL

One wouldn't think it from the way people are busily filling in forms all over the country, but there is in fact soccer life beyond Sportoto. The pools mania that is sweeping the country has somewhat obscured the very interesting complex of matches thrown up on the schedule for this weekend's 18th round of the National League.

The venue which excites the most interest is undoubtedly Bloomfield, where a terrific double-header is featured.

The 12.30 kick-off pits, in a "minor" Tel Aviv derby, two clubs who normally take a back seat to those affiliated to the three big sports organizations. The fact that they are overshadowed by the more glamourous clubs does not worry the fervent followers of Bnei Yehuda, the Hatikva Quarter side, and Shimshon, the Yemenite quarter team.

Bnei Yehuda under David Schweitzer have been unable to produce the string of impressive results, which almost took them undefeated through last season, but, since their return last month to their refurbished home stadium, they have at least looked promising. They still lack the services of the injured Baruch Maman. When he was acquired from Maccabi Haifa, Schweitzer hoped he would prove an inspiration in midfield.

Shimshon will be out to disprove the adage attached to them that they are only at their best when confronted by the best. Last week they despatched league leaders Maccabi Netanya in imperial style. Although they will probably start without the injured Ephraim Arbiv, they should have enough reserves of talent and stamina in defence to ensure that their 13-game unbeaten run is extended for another week.

That sets up the match of the day – last year's champions and this year's mysteriously ailing team Betar Jerusalem against the top dogs of the season from Netanya. The leaders have been struggling a little recently, winning only one of their last four games (the results speak for themselves – two goalless draws and that 1-3 defeat to Shimshon compensated only by a 4-2 victory over Hapoel Petah Tikva which was rather less impressive than the score suggests).

Still, they are back to full strength – which makes a change – although a midweek drubbing by FC Bruges, who were playing only at half pace, will not have helped their overall morale. But the sight of Betar should be enough to warm their blood.

The other side which has been put on the collective couch of the nation's soccer psychologists is Maccabi Tel Aviv. Others may pretend to the role, some may usurp it temporarily, but Maccabi are recognized as the true thoroughbreds of Israeli football. It seemed that they would live up to their breeding early in the season, when they were in hot pursuit of Netanya. Now a terrible slump – a draw and then four successive defeats – has sent their many fans (and they are at all levels of Tel Aviv's society, rivalled only by Betar Jerusalem for a crosssection of backers around the country) searching for explanations of their dismal displays. Can it be sartorial? Giora Spiegel decided that all his squad must arrive at matches wearing jackets and ties, and, even on the bench, Spiegel, his deputy Dror Barnur and the substitutes are all decoriously decked out. Can this breach of Israeli tradition be the reason for the lack of goals?

WEEKEND SCHEDULE – All kick-offs are at 2.30p.m. tomorrow unless otherwise stated. (Results from the first league fixture this season in parantheses) Bet. Jerusalem v Mac. Netanya – Bloomfield (3-1); Hap. Lod v Hap. Kfar Sava – Lod, today 2 p.m. (0-3); Hap. Holon v Hap. Tel Aviv – Holon, today 2.30 (1-2); Mac. Haifa Bet. Tel Aviv – Kiryat Eliezer (0-1); Shimshon v Bnei Yehuda – Bloomfield, 12.30 (2-1); Hap. Beersheba v Hap. Petah Tikva – Beersheba (0-1); Mac. Petah Tikva v Mac. Tel Aviv – Petah Tikva (1-3).

Why Israel lags in tourism stakes

Greer Fay Cashman

IS THIS the year in which Israel will finally reach the two million mark in incoming tourism? Don't hold your breath.

A few weeks back, international hotelier Leon Tamman hosted a razzle-dazzle reception at his Daniel Towers Hotel in Herzliya to celebrate a new record in tourist statistics. The nation's tourist intake for 1987 was just over 1.5 million. There was a lot of mutual back-slapping as guests toasted the quick recovery from the 1986 slump.

There were enthusiastic projections that 1988 would be an even better year.

The forecast was based less on market research than on a rose-coloured perception that tourism must escalate during Israel's 40th anniversary year.

Given the fact that the ratio of Jewish tourism to Israel has for some years been on the wane, this may well be a false premise. Though Christadelphians would undoubtedly be interested in being in Israel at some time during the coming year, one would imagine that the 40th anniversary per se would hold more appeal for Jews.

What people in the tourist business may not realize is that Jewish attitudes towards Israel have changed. World Zionist Organization and Jewish Agency chairman Simcha Dinitz is certainly aware of it. In a recent address to a United Israel Appeal study mission, Dinitz made the point that memories of the shtetl and the Holocaust, which inextricably linked Diaspora Jewry with Israel, are fading. The relationship between Israel and Jews abroad has to be based not on emotion, he said, but on logical involvement.

How does Israel compare with other tourist destinations? The only truly unique feature is the Land of the Bible image. The invitation to walk in the footsteps of Jesus certainly has meaning for Christian pilgrims; but pilgrims, though well represented in tourism statistics, don't make much of an impact on revenues from tourism, because they are seldom big spenders.

In fact, a lot of Israeli hoteliers are saying that the best guest – money-wise – is the home-grown variety. Israelis may be messier, coarser and louder than most foreign tourists, and more inclined towards souveniring the towels and the ashtrays, but in general, they compensate by spending a lot more money. Usually they order full-board packages; frequent the coffee-shop in the day-time and the bar at night.

Foreign visitors tend to go for bed-and-breakfast only and have been known to return to their hotel rooms carrying sandwiches purchased in the street, thus depriving both room service and the hotel dining rooms of revenues.

But then again, this is hardly surprising given the high cost of hotel accommodation in this country and the frequently outrageous prices for meals compared to what is charged for similar fare in downtown restaurants. And these, too, are far from cheap. The impression that most foreign tourists carry home with them is that Israel is expensive.

"Come to Israel and make a friend" is the gist of Israel's tourist promotion campaigns abroad, but many tourists who respond to the message find the Israelis to be far more aggressive than friendly.

Presuming that we can somehow inculcate good manners in areas where they are lacking, what else does Israel have to offer? A magnificent opera house? No. A theatre district? No. Historic palaces still in use? No. At best, there are a few Crusader castles that are uninhabited. There are some beautiful beaches, but tourists, even those who do follow the sun, want more than nice beaches.

Why is it that other Mediterranean countries can attract tourists in their millions and tens of millions, and Israel crows with delight at a score of 1.5 million. To keep on lagging so far behind for so long demonstrates that there is something seriously awry with Israel's marketing or infrastructure or both.

Even if the optimists are correct in their assessment, two million tourists spending two billion dollars is still too low a figure to give Israel cause to rest on her laurels.

Energy Minister Shahal and big three stand firm in clash over monopoly

Knives drawn in oil war

Shlomo Maoz and Lisa Perlman

Energy Minister Moshe Shahal has been trying to break down the local oil cartel since 1986 with a controversial "restructuring" plan.

Shahal is a Labour man who knows that the Histradut holding company, Hevrat Ha'ovdim, has vested interests in two of the three fuel companies (whose profits could be harmed by the reforms, at least in the short run). But he has still consistently pushed his plan. "I believe that a minister should work for the public utility rather than for his own party," he told The Jerusalem Post recently. "Since all or most of our economy is regulated, deregulation in the oil sector is going to be a test case. We have been used to working in a system of protected profits on a cost-plus basis."

The reform plan originally called for 100 per cent deregulation. But heavy pressure that reached the highest political levels led Shahal to submit a compromise proposal that would allow the six major institutional oil consumers, among them the state-owned Oil Refineries, the defence establishment and the Electric Corp., to buy 30 per cent of their refined products locally or on the spot market abroad. Until now the three oil companies have been the only available source; and they, like other opponents of deregulation, have continuously cried that it would be detrimental "for geopolitical reasons" and would "harm the country's defence" to open up markets.

Furthermore, the oil companies claim that they are more efficient than their counterparts abroad. If they are so efficient, what can they fear from competition? One worry, perhaps justified, is that another monopolistic monolith, the Oil Refineries, will push them out. For this reason, the reform plan allows for government supervision to be imposed on the refineries if they do not play by the rules. If they do not, they stand threatened to be split in two rival companies.

Under the reform, a third of the market will be opened up. The Energy Ministry will set a ceiling on market prices, below which competition should thrive. Paz, the biggest oil company and representing the three, charges that this will not improve the situation that exists today, whereby the Energy Ministry determines prices based on those in Europe.

Company officials add that the competition does exist today. But according to official reports by the Industry and Trade Ministry's Ze'ev Galmor, in charge of business restrictions, the companies behave like a true cartel without breaching the law. They even go so far as to supply each other with oil products when supply is short.

It is not simply a matter of semantics: competition under the reform would take a different and more active form than it does today.

The companies did, it should be noted, agree in principle to the compromise proposal when the ministry added a final point – that the Oil Refineries would be prevented from selling oil products directly to consumers, but would rather have to go through the fuel companies. But the three added a further condition, which the ministry will not accept – that the refineries also be banned from independently importing oil.

Shahal has stood firm, and in a late-night showdown Monday, he announced his intention to implement the reform plan unilaterally. In response, the oil companies threatened to petition the High Court of Justice to block the whole thing. The plight of the government minister trying to do battle not only with the corporations, but even with some of his own peers – and party colleagues – continues.

SEVEN wise men went down to Egypt. There they sought not bread, as their forefathers did to aid their drought-stricken Israelite brethren, but rather to buy more oil in accordance with the latter-day peace treaty that exists between the two countries. Among the seven there to renew Israel's buying contract were representatives of the three companies that comprise the local oil cartel.

The deal, of course, could have been clinched with but one representative in Egypt or even via telex, one expert has suggested.

But since the oil sector works on a cost-plus basis, the cartel members did not worry about the expense. The consumer will cover the costs.

A newcomer to Israel could be forgiven for thinking that the oil companies work on a laissez-faire basis, considering the amount of energy they put into promoting their various products. In fact, however, they are all working for the same cause – and in cahoots.

The market is closed and divided solely among Paz Oil Co. (45 per cent), Delek Fuel Corp. (30 per cent) and Sonol Ltd. (25 per cent).

Indeed, "regulation," "monopoly," "cartel" – these are the key concepts that have characterized most sectors of Israeli industry for decades.

The energy sector well exemplifies the problem of the Israeli economy in general: Like other industries, it has thrived on regulation and the cost-plus sales system. Whenever the government showed any interest in deregulation, it always encountered strong opposition from groups with vested interests in controls.

There was a time when the situation that exists today was not only suitable but necessary. In 1948, the Haifa oil terminal was suddenly cut off from its suppliers in Iraq. Later on, during the 1950s, foreign fuel companies left Israel to fend for itself – which was not easy in an oil world controlled by the large and influential companies known as the "seven sisters." Israeli energy companies began to establish secret contacts with Iran, replacing the Arab sources of pre-state days with the Shah's oil and money.

But those days are over. The spot market has become dominant and the power of Opec diminished.

The oil sector well exemplifies all Israel's economic woes – monopoly, long-term agreements, and ensured profits, in this case for the three fuel companies – Paz, Delek and Sonol. Other countries have already overcome the initial fears and pains of changing over to a deregulated system, and found that it even brought profits to their economies and industry.

Israel has remained preoccupied with its own wars – always crying "defence!" as an excuse for keeping things out of the public eye – while other countries began fighting an economic war.

Privatization is now inevitable

Pinhas Landau

ACCORDING TO Dr Samuel Johnson, "a woman's preaching is like a dog walking on its hinder legs. It is not done well; but you are surprised to find it done at all." So it is with the government's efforts to divest itself of the corporations it owns.

One could go further and say that nowadays it is less and less surprising to find women preachers. By the same token, it is less and less surprising to find governments of every stripe engaged in privatizing their economies, both through direct asset sales and through deregulation.

A change as deep-seated as this in so many national economies can only reflect a basic force at work. The factors feeding this force are by now well-known: Technological progress and the emergence of a world market have created a rapidly changing environment which highlights the need for flexibility in managing human and financial resources.

State-owned industries, which are either protected, monopolies, or both, have been revealed as being generally unsuited to growth, or even surviving in this environment. Attempts to delay adjusting to it have foundered, usually after squandering vast sums in vain attempts to prevent the inevitable.

Israel, for all its determination to persuade itself that it is somehow different, faces the same problems and has made most of the same mistakes.

Thus the move toward placing greater stress on private enterprise and to recognizing that the use of resources has to be justified by the results, has become an irresistible force. No single country, company or organization can hold out against it – and survive. However, there are still those who are determined to hold out, even at the cost of perishing in what they see as a worthy cause.

A PRINCIPAL reason why the Israeli economy is so behind in adjusting to these world changes is its well-entrenched die-hard resistance. The fact that this is mostly based on vested interests concerned with protecting fiefdoms, rather than carrying the flag for outdated ideologies, does not make the resistance less tenacious – rather the opposite.

This very factor should have facilitated the job of those people and institutions interested in moving the economy into line with world trends. That it has not done so is based on the second reason for Israeli slowness – the cowardice and sheer incompetence of the Israeli pro-privatization camp.

Cowardice is demonstrated by the fact that even today the majority of educated people in this country have no idea what privatization is, why it is neccessary, how it might be put into effect, and how they will benefit. Without a broad educational effort – call it public debate, propaganda, or brain-washing – the wider support neccessary to overcome the opposition of the small, but powerful, groups that stand to lose from privatization will never be obtained.

Incompetence is also much in evidence. Years of talk and months of effort have produced little result. One or two minor companies have sold a few shares on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange. Bits and pieces of some others have been sold to investor groups. But a long list of attempts to sell off state firms have ended in frustration for both would-be buyers and sellers.

Why? For any number of reasons. The companies are poorly managed. Sometimes they are not managed at all, and seem to operate through sheer inertia. Their boards of directors are mostly dumping grounds for ministers' cronies; sometimes they don't function at all because rival ministers squabble over whose crony will get which job. Thus five subsidiaries of Israel Chemicals have not had a quorum of directors, and hence no board meetings, for months because Moshe Nissim and Ariel Sharon are broigez.

The companies' books are often in a mess (as the Mivnay Taasiya affair proved, when the Securities Authority investigation showed that the firm lost NIS 11m. in 1986, instead of making NIS 8m. as it had first claimed). Even if a company has a board, management and workforce which function, it often has no clear idea of what it is supposed to be doing. Many government companies are not supposed to make profits at all; others, if they do make them, have them plundered by the Treasury for funds. This regularly occurs to the Dead Sea Works.

Trade unions, whose members are sitting in overpaid jobs in companies that are usually grossly over-staffed, are understandably unhappy at the prospect of having their nirvana shaken by hard men talking cold numbers. Zion Cables, where the work-force bitterly resisted a sale to private investors, was a foretaste of what might happen in other companies.

GIVEN THESE problems, it may seem understandable that so little progress has been made. But they are just excuses.

The way to tackle these problems is head-on, and the primary tool is money. Most of the opposition can be bought off: the workers who are dismissed can be given huge redundancy payments, and those who remain, wage rises and shares; ditto, but more so, for management. Politicians have to be made to understand that if they learn how to sell privatization to the public, it can be a major vote-catcher for them.

But none of this has happened and since 1988 is an election year, it seems an unlikely time for a breakthrough on the privatization front. Even if the hopes of the Israeli officials and the American bankers involved in the privatization drive are fulfilled and one major share issue – Bezek presumably – is made this summer, this year is likely to see the government dramatically extend, rather than reduce, its ownership of major companies, simply because it must buy all the bank shares covered by the "arrangement." That will, at a stroke, double the size of the privatization programme needed to get the government out of businesses.

Nevertheless, it is inevitable that the state will sell whatever it can. There are two main reasons for this inevitability. The first is the "irresistible force" process outlined above. The long-term growth of the corporations themselves can only be achieved by making them viable entities. If they remain inefficient and dependent on government support, while becoming increasingly politicized, they will wither away.

The second is that, aside from the good of the companies themselves, the Treasury's own needs will force it to sell. Here we come back to the government's debt. The Israeli government owes NIS 70b. to its citizens. Although its economic policy successes have allowed it to stop borrowing more to finance budget deficits, the cost of interest on existing debts is several billion shekels a year. In the long-term, this debt must be reduced, both relatively, as a proportion of the country's GNP, and absolutely.

In order to reduce the absolute amount of debt, the government must either run a large budget surplus, and use the extra money to repay debts, or it must sell assets. The first is very difficult and hence unlikely. Ergo, we conclude that, irrespective of reasons of ideology, or the welfare of the companies involved, sheer budgetary exigencies will force the government to sell its holdings, effectively swapping equity for debt.

Once the politicians accept these inevitabilities, and are persuaded that they can be turned to their political advantage, they will convince themselves that they believe in privatization.

THE previous articles in this series, in which senior executives of New York investment banking firms spoke of their interest in any Israeli privatization programme, prove that the outside world believes the process to be feasible. Had they thought they were making a mistake, they had an excellent opportunity last October to make a graceful exit.

Yet in practice they did nothing of the sort. A few days after Black Monday, Robert Wygod, the Paine Webber managing director from the corporate finance department who is heading the firm's involvement in Israel, wanted to postpone the visit to Israel he had scheduled for November. Not cancel, just postpone to early 1988.

In other words, when circumstances arose that could have justified a complete change of approach, Paine Webber – like the other Wall Street firms involved – decided to press on, not pull back. This should be conclusive proof for all sceptics that these companies are serious about Israel. The question that remains to be answered is when is Israel going to get serious about them – and about itself.

Fund and games

The mutual funds, despite having declared themselves an "industry," treat their business like a game. They have league tables, scores and rankings, and they seem to go in and out of form like footballers.

The Meitav investment analyst firm has carved out for itself the position of the mutual fund field's independent observer. Month by month, and at the end of quarters, halves and years, it spews out all the relevant facts and figures, as well as a fair amount of irrelevant stuff too.

Picking through Meitav's end-of-1987 reports, we found the following items of interest:

The key trend within the industry, whereby the group of funds managed by Hapoalim is growing, primarily at the expense of Leumi which used to be absolutely dominant, is confirmed at every turn.

That Leumi's share of the total market crumbled from 48.2 per cent to 40.8 per cent in two years, while Hapoalim's has grown from 22.4 per cent to 28.4 per cent, is well-known. Less well-known is that Hapoalim has begun to eat into the dominant position of Leumi's individual funds.

Thus, whereas at the end of 1986 the 10 largest funds contained seven of Leumi in positions one through seven, followed respectfully by three of Hapoalim, a year later Leumi only had the five biggest funds, with places six and seven having fallen to Hapoalim.

The poor performance of Leumi's funds cannot be doing much to help this situation. Probably the most interesting part of the Meitav report highlights the different investment policies that now characterize the Hapoalim and Leumi groups of funds.

During 1987, Leumi increased the share of index-linked bonds in its group's total assets from 36 to 43 per cent and of shares from 14 to 19 per cent. Foreign-currency linked investments were slashed: From 12 to eight per cent in regular bonds and deposits, and from 30 to 16 per cent in the "arrangement" bank group.

Hapoalim decreased its index-linked component from 41 to 33 per cent over the year, despite – or perhaps because of – the high returns this area gave in 1987. Foreign-currency linked assets were pruned rather than slashed, with regular bonds down from an already low six per cent to only three per cent, and "arrangement" shares from 23 to 19 per cent.

Hapoalim rammed up its share component from 19 per cent at the end of 1986 – the level Leumi reached a year later – to 28 per cent at the end of 1987. To put the matter differently, whereas Leumi's share component rose along with the market, especially in the first part of 1987, Hapoalim aggressively bumped up its share assets.

These statistics confirm the pattern of trading in the share market for months past. Hapoalim is generally a buyer, Leumi has been selling as and where possible in the context of a dull market with low volume.

Clearly, one of these assessments is going to be wrong – unless 1988 ends up providing much the same yields on shares and bonds, as occurred in 1987. Even then, timing of market moves will be vital in determining the outcome.

The fact that the Clal group has been a buyer in recent months, along with Hapoalim, is also significant. Clal racked up an excellent record during 1987 for selling high after buying low.

According to Yitzhak Schrem, the group's financial director, that is the strategy underlying the current purchasing strategy. He makes no bones of the fact that Clal has a basically optimistic view of the 1988 outlook for the share market.

Nissim rejects Ne'eman's final appeal for aid for the electronics industry

By KEN SCHACHTER

TEL AVIV – Yigal Ne'eman, in his swansong as chairman of the Association of Electronics Industries, yesterday repeated an appeal for government aid, prompting Finance Minister Moshe Nissim to reply with his favourite refrain of fiscal austerity.

In a word, Nissim's answer was "no."

Ne'eman, president of Tadiran Ltd., made his case at the annual meeting of the association. He complained that industrialists had to shoulder a disproportionate share of the burden for the government's 1985 recovery programme.

Since 1985, he said, the industry has had to absorb three major blows: a 20 per cent cut in government export subsidies; a 45 per cent increase in the value of the shekel versus the dollar, and a one-third reduction in Defence Ministry orders. In the three years since the economic programme was introduced, he said, the industry has had to dismiss 5,000 workers and 3,000 more will have to be laid off this year.

One-third of those dismissals are related to streamlining, he said, but the rest are caused by slack business.

Ne'eman called for increased orders from the Defence Ministry and Bezek and urged the passage of a "Buy Israeli" act modelled after the "Buy American" act that gives U.S. companies an edge in government purchases.

Israeli industrialists have been clamouring in recent months for the government to devalue the shekel, but Ne'eman, in an interview after his speech, said the industry would accept actions other than a devaluation. He declined to specify what steps would be acceptable, however.

Nissim, in his reply to Ne'eman's speech, said that any aid to the electronics industry would have to come from another sector of the budget at a time when the ministries of education and health are moaning about insufficient funding.

In 1987, he said, exports grew 11.2 per cent in real terms, a record unmatched by the U.S. or Europe. This, he said, could be attributed to budgetary policies that created the climate for economic growth.

Nissim also rebuffed a suggestion by Ne'eman that Israel should gradually wean itself from U.S. civilian aid, saying Israel won't forgo American help.

Ne'eman will be succeeded as the association's head by Benny Peled, president of Elscint.

Ya'acobi calls on cabinet to reimpose surtax

Post Finance Reporter

Economics Minister Gad Ya'acobi has tabled a motion for Sunday's cabinet meeting which calls to continue the surtax on high wage-earners for the 1988/89 budget year.

Ya'acobi believes that slapping the 10 per cent surcharge on the highest tax rate of 48 per cent – bringing it to 52.8 per cent – will bring in NIS55 million of extra revenue for the government.

This sum, he notes, will allow Finance Minister Moshe Nissim to bring his budget cuts back to the NIS755m. target he originally set, from the NIS742m. that Nissim said he was left with after the cabinet approved the budget last Sunday.

The remaining NIS42m. could serve several other purposes, Ya'acobi suggests. Some of it could go to the hard-pressed education and health budgets, some to assist companies in development areas that are in trouble, and some to help export firms break into new overseas markets.

By way of comparison, Ya'acobi's proposal includes a list of every Western country whose maximum tax bracket is higher than 52.8 per cent. These range from Belgium with 81 per cent through Holland with 72 per cent, down to West Germany and Australia with 56 and 55 per cent respectively.

However, Ya'acobi does not mention that the maximum rate in these countries only comes into effect at much higher levels of income than the NIS8,000 per month level he is proposing for Israel.

Nissim and others have argued in the past that the main source of competition for high-earning Israelis is the U.S., where the maximum personal tax rate is now 33 per cent.

Gov't support for diamonds

By SHLOMO MAOZ
Post Economic Editor

The government has decided to support the diamond-polishing industry with an additional $1.5 million. Last year the diamond industry received approximately $8m. through the "foreign exchange insurance" programme. Recently the Treasury recognized that the added-value of the industry has risen, so it merits additional support. But the decision, which has been taken following significant pressure from the diamond sector, is only a temporary one.

An interministerial committee is now discussing the real added-value of the diamond industry. Early estimates suggest that it is around 13-14 per cent as compared to 19 per cent in the early 1980s. The plunge in added-value is due to the industry's move to bigger rough diamonds, rather than the traditionally small ones, a market in which India today reigns supreme.

Officials said this week that even though the calculation may have suggested that the added-value is higher than the 9.5 per cent according to which the government pays its support, this does not mean that the government should increase that support since added-value is not the only consideration. For example, the officials noted that the tourism industry does not get support anywhere near to that which the diamond industry or other industries receive.

Last year net imports of diamonds totalled $1,901m. and exports totalled $2,053m., representing a net diamond export of $152 million as compared to $67 million in 1986.

Shekel falls

The shekel continued to fall against the U.S. dollar yesterday, dropping another half-agora to 1.5650 to the dollar. This brought the cumulative devaluation of the last 3 days to 1.80 percent.

However, government sources denied any change in policy and said that the shekel's decline merely reflected the U.S. currency's recent rebound.

Meanwhile, a late rally pushed Wall Street share prices to a higher close yesterday, extending the new year winning streak.

The Dow index closed up 14 points at 2,052, according to early, unofficial figures.

No reason to fret

UNFAZED, and rightly so, by the UN Security Council's unanimous "call" on Israel to avoid deporting Palestinians termed dangerous inciters, the government is reported to be going ahead with its plans for deportation. The fact that the U.S. had this time actively supported the council's resolution, seems to have had the effect of water running over a duck's back.

To be sure, official regrets over the American action were duly expressed in Jerusalem. The foreign minister took umbrage at what he termed a grave exception to the rule. The prime minister too deplored it, but advised against playing into the hands of enemies by making too much of it. Mr. Shamir saw no sign of the vote signalling any radical departure in American policy on Israel, nor even a serious deterioration in bilateral ties.

Official comments in Washington appear to fully warrant Mr. Shamir's optimism. The State Department's spokesman, for one, pointed out that the U.S. had opposed Israel's practice of deportation in previous UN votes. The latest vote, he said, should not be seen as reflecting any basic change in the overall friendly U.S.-Israel relationship.

In other words, Washington was duty-bound to accommodate its friends in the Arab world by joining in the council vote. But the diplomatic charade meant nothing of any real consequence.

It need not, therefore, be taken seriously by Israel's government. Not even if the premier keeps proclaiming, as he did again yesterday, that the territories of Judea, Samaria and the Gaza District, which most everyone, including Israel's High Court of Justice, considers to be under the legal regime of belligerent occupation, are in fact not "occupied" at all; that Eretz Yisrael in its absolute entirety is the Jewish People's rightful historic patrimony forever, and that the legitimate aspirations of the Arabs in those territories could until the end of time be expressed only through a "full autonomy" under Israel's sovereign rule.

All that, Mr. Shamir was careful to observe in an interview he granted to Hungarian Television yesterday, was a minimum programme which already represented a retreat from Israel's legitimate claim of right to the Land on both banks of the Jordan river.

Israel, in short, is not, according to Mr. Shamir, an occupier anywhere, but a rightful possessor everywhere. It is unfriendly, therefore, to bother Israel with pronouncements of the Fourth Geneva Convention on the subject, for example, of deportations from occupied territories. The defence of the Israeli territories of Judea, Samaria and the Gaza District against hostile elements from both without and within, is Israel's own exclusive concern.

If Mr. Shamir's definition of Israel's status in the territories straddles the consensus between the U.S. and Israel, then Washington should surely not engage in the games the UN plays. If it doesn't, Mr. Shamir has every right to argue that any such U.S. reservations, tepid as they are, justifies being soft on the Americans when they do play the UN game.

NEW PHASE IN OLD WAR

or internal agitation (by PLO activists). By arresting or sometimes even deporting the agitators, and by adopting an iron fist policy for a short while, says this view, the riots and demonstrations will stop sooner or later.

But today, almost a month after the latest wave of riots started, it is not dying out. In addition, some local leaders in East Jerusalem and the West Bank, who are known as moderates among the PLO supporters, are trying to launch a civil disobedience campaign. This attempt, led by Hanna Siniora, will certainly not be the Palestinian equivalent of the Boston Tea Party.

Most of Siniora's colleagues strongly oppose this idea, saying that he wants to exploit it for purposes of a personal public relations campaign rather than to achieve any meaningful political objective. They also think that this idea does not appeal to the man in the street.

It seems that for the time being, the idea of civil disobedience will hardly catch on.

Meanwhile, it appears that the IDF is about to change its policy in dealing with rioters. Instead of confronting them, the army will try to isolate them. The IDF may decide, for example, to protect the main highways, leaving the Palestinian youths in the refugee camps and town centres to stew in their own juice. When necessary, the army will enter the camps and towns, but only after careful preparation and with large forces.

There is no doubt that the latest riots constitute the most serious wave of unrest and disturbances in the territories since June 1967. But it still remains to be seen whether they are the beginning of some form of violent uprising. There is also no doubt that the latest events reflect deep frustration and despair among the vast majority of the territories' inhabitants, and their strong desire for a political solution.

Are the Palestinians in the territories strong enough to confront the Israeli authorities - mainly the IDF - for another month or more? Are the Palestinians sufficently united to start a civil disobedience campaign that would realy hurt the Israelis ?

The answer to both questions is probably " no," at least not for the time being. The IDF after learning its lessons from the latest riots will not let the Palestinian youths go on a rampage for much longer. The only act of civil disobedience that would really hurt the Israelis would be the Palestinian workers from the West Bank and Gaza not coming to work in Israel. At this stage, they cannot carry out such an act unless they are willing to starve.

No doubt, the Palestinians will continue the riots and disturbances, but they will take the form of periodic outbursts and not non-stop riots that exhaust both sides.

The first reaction of many Israeli Jews to the continued riots was a deep shock and sometimes even fear, the feeling of being surrounded outside and being choked inside by a hostile and belligerent enemy who want to uproot them from this region.

The Palestinian reaction was different: a mixture of pride and self-confidence. Sometimes, especially during the first days of the riots, this reaction was even charactarized by intoxication: "We made it, we are much stronger than we had thought we were, an independent Palestinian state is on its way."

Both reactions were exaggerated. No one, at this stage, can uproot the Israeli Jews from their homeland and an independent Palestinian state is not in the cards. It seems that both peoples, the occupier and the occupied, will have to continue along the path they are now on for an unpredictable period.

SOVIETS

for an extension of visas, he said that the Soviet mission had "important work" to do here in connection with Soviet properties. He noted that the task of the mission here "demands more work and time," which is why the Soviets asked for an extension in October.

Israeli officials have said in private conversations that the Soviet mission here is virtually unemployed after having dealt with the renewal of passports of Soviet citizens and with the legal problems of the Soviet property holdings.

Pensleyev refused to countenance the term "delegation" in the Israeli request, but spoke rather of "several persons" in a "group." He refused to comment on the duration of the visas being considered for the Israelis, but said that the Israeli request was quite "precise" and that the duration will be commensurate with the Israeli group's tasks.

Pensleyev was fully aware of the press reports in Israel yesterday concerning Martirosov's meetings on Wednesday in the Foreign Ministry.

He dismissed speculation that Martirosov's diplomatic background meant that the Soviets were contemplating a change in the nature of their mission here. "There is no change in the consular nature of the mission," he said, adding that the reasons for Martirosov's arrival were "practical".

Statistics and half-truths

EVERYONE KNOWS about lies, damned lies, and statistics. But not every lie has a statistic to support it, and not every statistic is a lie. To make matters worse, in Israel we have reams of statistics that are not lies at all, but wholesome truths. The only trouble with them is that the truths they tell are historical, because the statistics are out of date.

A year ago, it may be recalled, everyone was searching high and low for "growth." While they were looking, it happened, and passed them by. Now they've located it, they're busy making speeches in its honour. They don't yet know, or maybe they don't want to know, that it's past its prime and is fading fast.

Why couldn't they find it when they looked, and why don't they realize what's happening now? Because "they," i.e. the economic decision-makers, look only where the light is cast, not where things actually are. For "them" the light is that part of the economy and that period of time which the Central Bureau of Statistics illuminates through its published figures.

Thus it was that in late 1986 and early 1987 the establishment was bleating plaintively that the economy was stagnant. At that very time, however, the economy's growth rate was its fastest in 15 years. Anyone who bothered to visit factories or other places where people actually work was aware that production, employment and other measures of real economic activity were moving ahead smartly.

Other indicators told the same story: The share market doubled its price level in half a year, from November 1986; consumption boomed; foreign vacations became the norm again; Israelis repatriated money they had stashed overseas. But in the tea-drinking offices and corridors of Jerusalem, the bureaucrats, and hence their political masters, remained in a state of self-imposed ignorance. The statistical data that they had, and on which they built such crucial policy as the budget for 1987/88, pertained to the first half of 1986 and showed the economy still stuck in the doldrums.

For example, at the end of 1986, the Central Bureau of Statistics published its estimates for the economy's performance that year. They pointed to a rise in Gross Domestic Product of 1.1 per cent overall and 2.3 per cent in the business sector. Other measures of activity appeared to have been similarly restrained. It was plain then that the figures would move sharply upwards when the data for the latter months of the year were in. The authorities continued to pretend that they represented the whole truth.

In due course, those figures were indeed reworked, to show rises of 2.2 per cent in overall GDP, and 3.8 percent in the business sector. The difference in numbers is comparable to that between anemia and a healthy blood count.

TODAY WE have precisely the opposite state of affairs. The official line is that the economy is growing strongly, perhaps even too strongly. Now we're in the election year, therefore, the object of policy is to prevent the pot from boiling over.

As proof, "they" cite the CBS estimates for 1986. These show GDP up by 4.6 per cent over the year (in real terms) with the business sector positively surging by no less than 6.2 per cent. Since Israel is not South Korea or Hongkong, these numbers may legitimately be described as excellent.

Unfortunately, though, they are too good to be true. They don't take into account that the second half of 1987 saw a noticeable decline in the pace of economic activity. Again, the evidence is openly available, if you are prepared to look at indicators other than the CBS's obsolete numbers.

The decline in pace was suggested by the slump in the stock market that began in early summer and the peaking out of the boomlet in house prices in the later summer. Housing starts declined in the third quarter, industrial production stabilized after the first, while even the consumer boom has been straining to maintain the levels it reached early in 1987.

Most significantly of all, in the context of election year policy, unemployment is no longer falling but clearly growing. Part of the explanation for this is the minimum wage law which, as every economist knows, will push lower-paid workers out of jobs and encourage their replacement by machines or hasten the demise of the industry they work in. This merely aggravates a deteriorating employment situation that stems from a weakening economy.

All this is not to suggest that the economy is going into recession. There is no evidence at all – at least so far – to support that view and, if there is no world slump to kill off our exports, there seems little danger of such a development. But, to return to the analogy, the treatment of a person whose blood pressure is high and rising is different from that of someone whose blood pressure was high but is now falling.

The CBS statistics for 1987, under whose influence the budget is being prepared, will almost certainly be revised later as last year's were – but this time downwards. The rate of growth for 1987 will turn out to be less rapid, because of the slow-down in the last part of the year.

The planners realize, of course, that the pace of growth of early 1987 was unsupportable, and the new budget assumes that 1988 will be more sedate. But "they" will not admit, until they get what they consider adequate proof, that the slow-down is not a future event but a present reality which already extends several months into the past.

INTERESTINGLY, the pattern of the annual economy for several years has been that the first half and the second half have differed widely. This began in 1984, when the first half of the year saw the government trying to boost the economy in the run-up to the July elections, after the financial collapses of 1983 threatened to lay it low. Immediately after the elections there was a dramatic reversal as the pretence that things were fine was dropped and emergency measures followed each other in quick succession.

1985 was divided into two halves by the Economic Stabilization Plan launched on July 1. The first half was a period of hyper-inflationary confusion, while the second witnessed a sharp disinflationary recession. There were two less definable periods in 1986. The first was the continued aftermath of the ESP, which gradually gave way to a resurgence of non-inflationary economic growth. This reached its peak in the first part of 1987, but the second half of last year saw a change to decelerating growth.

There is no law of nature that says that this stop-go, up-and-down pattern has to be repeated every year. But with the economy refusing to stay where the Treasury and the Bank of Israel models think it is, it is quite possible that 1988 will see another half-and-half year.

Thus, the policy-makers will wake up in a few months time to where we are now – unemployment a worse problem than inflation, the balance of trade not getting worse because demand is falling, but lower tax revenues widening the budget deficit. Then, under growing political pressure and with the election just around the corner, they will start dishing out medicine to make people feel better for the crucial second half of 1988.

This policy trend may be especially important since job losses in vulnerable industries such as construction, textiles and some service sectors will fall heavily on West Bank and Gaza Arabs. Keeping them off the streets and at work is likely to become a major, if unspoken, policy consideration, at least for the short-term – meaning until the end of 1988.

What happens after that will be the problem of the next government.

AUTONOMY: NO SOLUTION

To the Editor of The Jerusalem Post

Sir, – The recent troubles in the West Bank and Gaza have at least helped to focus our thoughts on what should be the final arrangements for these territories.

People like Eliahu Ben-Elissar and Dan Meridor keep repeating the standard Likud refrain: "We will keep sovereignty in Jewish hands and we will give those Arabs autonomy and nothing more."

This "solution" ignores completely two basic elements in autonomy. There are a few democratic countries in the world where a small minority group has autonomy, such as Swedes in Finland and the Tyrolean Austrians in Italy. The first basic requirement is that the minority group wants autonomy and actively seeks it. Would anyone here dare to say that the Palestinians are just crying out for autonomy? Of course, what they want is sovereignty.

The second basic requirement is that autonomy be given to the minority in addition to full participation on their part in the general government of the country as a whole. Our annexationists want to give the Arabs autonomy instead of participation in the Knesset and the government. All important matters would be decided by the Jews, and the Arabs within the Green Line (defence taxes, money, land, industry, radio), and the minor ones would be decided by the Arabs in the territories (language, religion, schools, municipal by-laws).

This is what the annexationists call an equitable arrangement, and they expect modern people in the twentieth century to accept it.

LET US STRETCH OUT OUR HAND

To the Editor of The Jerusalem Post

Sir, – About 40 years ago, around 1947, after some particularly nasty incident, the London Daily Express carried a banner headline. "Let's get out of Palestine now."

We might do well to ponder on that episode, with due regard to the obvious differences between the two situations – that of the British in Palestine towards the end of the Mandate, and ours today in the territories.

It would be hazardous to prophesy. But plain, rational reasoning would indicate that the odds are heavily against our ability to retain the territories in the long run. There are several factors leading to this conclusion: the demographic aspect, resistance of the population, the neighbouring Arab countries, world opinion, the impermanence of military superiority, as well as the accumulative effect of occupation upon our society.

Basically we have two options. We can continue to procrastinate, improvising from one disturbance to the next. We can continue to put our trust in mass aliya and continued Arab disunity. We can persist in our belief that the bleak forecasts will not materialize, and that the problem will, somehow, disappear. Until one day we may be faced with a full-scale rebellion which may escalate to an extent where we may be relieved to get rid of the entire mess, perhaps as indicated in the above-quoted newspaper headline.

Or, rather than wait until we are pushed into a corner, we can take the initiative while we are still in a bargaining position, before the scales have tilted against us.

In his book The Revolt, Menachem Begin quoted Jabotinsky (albeit in an altogether different context); "...and if the good of the people requires that you stretch out your hand to (your enemy), don't let your memory be 'black.' Forget what must be forgotten and give him your hand."

UNNATURAL DISASTER

To the Editor of The Jerusalem Post

Sir, – In his letter of December 29, David Bar-Hayim refers to Ariel Sharon as a "victim," forced to live under the protection of 300 police officers. Rabbi Bar-Hayim then makes the astonishing assertion that "Arabs can go where they please."

As we have learned from racist attacks in Upper Nazareth and firebombings in Ramat Amidar, any Palestinian Arab, citizen or otherwise, who wishes to live in a Jewish neighbourhood had better hire his own police protection.

If Rabbi Bar-Hayim has served in the IDF, he is surely aware that Arab citizens and residents of the occupied territories are routinely stopped at roadblocks and subjected to the humiliating inspection of their papers, their property, and often their persons. Any visitor to our own neighbouring Eilat can testify to this.

In the great civil war which is descending upon our country, Sharon, far from being a victim, is an active agent who serves to split the Jewish camp and to unite the Arabs against us. But neither are we his victims, for he is an unnatural disaster which we have brought upon ourselves.
